The report confirms that global warming increases in recent decades are human-induced and that climate changes already have visible impacts in the United States, notably Alaska, may it be through erosion in coastal areas to changes in water availability and insect infestations.

Culprit for the warming trend is a combination of emissions from burning fossil fuels such as coal, oil and gas and the clearing of forests and agricultural practices. John Holdren, assistant to President Barack Obama for science and technology, said that the report paints a comprehensive picture and urges to take action. "It tells us why remedial action is needed sooner than later as well as showing why that action must include both global emissions reductions to reduce the extent of climate change and local adaptation measures to reduce the damage from the changes that are no longer avoidable," Holdren said in a statement.

University of Fairbanks scientists David McGuire and John Walsh were part of the study. "A key point from the study is that, from everything we're seeing in terms of impacts, it's clear that we are committed to more warming," said McGuire, a landscape ecology professor and researcher with the UAF Institute of Arctic Biology.

Scientists agree that cuts in carbon dioxide emissions would lessen warming over this century and beyond. If emissions continue to rise at or near current rates, temperature increases are more likely to be near the upper range of temperature rise projections. While warmer temps sometimes seem appealing to arctic and sub-arctic residents, warming upsets the balance in a frail ecosystem with potentially severe consequences. Temperatures rise faster in the winter and in the arctic, the report says. The arctic also stands out in the report's projections of more precipitation while the tropics see a decrease in rainfall. Key predictions for Alaska include drier conditions, an increase in insect infestations and wildfires, declines in lakes and increase in coastal storms threatening coastal villages and fishing fleets; change and decline in fisheries and infrastructure damage due to melting permafrost.

The projected sea-level rise increases erosion, storm surge damage and flooding, especially in the Southeast US and in Alaska. Due to the ocean's absorption of carbon dioxide, it has been observed that the oceans are increasingly acid, which in turn leads to the inability of corals and other sea life to build shells and skeletons.

While Alaska sees increased beetle infestations, rapidly melting glaciers and erosion problems already, the report says that all different scenarios considered, "relatively large and sustained changes in many aspects of climate are projected by the middle of this century, with even larger changes by the end of this century."

"Choices made about emissions reductions now and over the next few decades will have far-reaching consequences for climate-change impacts," the report says.

"Almost no policy action could be implemented that would mitigate the factors causing the warming fast enough that we wouldn't experience any impacts," said McGuire. "It's up to our society to make decisions about the degree of warming and impacts we are willing to deal with." Not only environmental consequences are projected, but also national security issues are addressed as global food and water scarcity could lead to mass migrations, health impacts and even armed conflicts.

According to an Alaska fact sheet published with the report, over the past 50 years, Alaska has warmed at more than twice the rate of the rest of the United States. Its annual average temperature has increased 3.4°F, while winters have warmed even more, by 6.3°F. As a result, climate change effects are much more pronounced than in other regions of the United States. The higher temperatures are already causing earlier spring snowmelt, reduced sea ice, widespread glacier retreat and melting permafrost.

"Alaska's at the vanguard of climate change and we're seeing the changes here sooner than elsewhere," said John Walsh, director of the Center for Global Change and Arctic System Research at UAF's International Arctic Research Center.

In conclusion, the report says that a combination of mitigation and adaptation is in store for humanity to deal with the problem. Also, more science and research is needed to supply the basis for society to come up with adaptation and mitigation strategies. "The best decisions about these strategies will come when there is widespread understanding of the complex issue of climate change — the science and its many implications for our nation," the report says. While humans have adapted to changing circumstances in the past, "future adaptations will be particularly challenging because society won't be adapting to a new steady state but rather to a rapidly moving target," the report concludes.

Key findings for United States:

- Climate changes are underway in the United States and are projected to grow. Climate-related changes are already observed in the United States and its coastal waters. These include increases in heavy downpours, rising temperature and sea level, rapidly retreating glaciers, thawing permafrost, lengthening growing seasons, lengthening ice-free seasons in the ocean and on lakes and rivers, earlier snowmelt, and alterations in river flows. These changes are projected to grow.
- Crop and livestock production will be increasingly challenged. Agriculture is considered one of the sectors most adaptable to changes in climate. However, increased heat, pests, water stress, diseases, and weather extremes will pose adaptation challenges for crop and livestock production.
- Threats to human health will increase. Health impacts of climate change are related to heat stress, waterborne diseases, poor air quality, extreme weather events, and diseases transmitted by insects and rodents.

Key findings for Alaska:

- Longer summers and higher temperatures are causing drier conditions.
- Insect outbreaks and wildfires are increasing warming.
- Closed-body lakes in Interior Alaska are declining in area.
- Thawing permafrost damages roads, runways, water and sewer systems, and other infrastructure.
- Coastal storms increase risks to villages and fishing fleets.
- Displacement of marine species will affect key fisheries.

the outgoing Alaska District Commander, will command a new Corps district office at Kandahar in southern Afghanistan. Koenig had served as the Chief of the Operations Branch for the Office of the Chief of Engineers at the Pentagon and in Iraq from July 2006 to August 2007. ### Corps proposes to continue clean up Northeast Cape on St. Lawrence Island

In early July, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers plans to remove toxic waste left by former military facilities at Northeast Cape on St.

Lawrence Island. The work is scheduled to begin in early July and end by mid September.

The U.S. Air Force constructed an Aircraft Control and Warning station and a White Alice Communications System station at Northeast Cape in the early 1950s. The operations ended in 1969 and 1972 when the buildings and most equipment were abandoned in place due to the high cost of removing them from the remote island. A solid waste dump for the installations was located along Cargo Beach Road. The Corps wants to expose and remove the buried drums and contaminated soil from the Cargo Beach Road landfill and then build a new landfill cap. The Corps also plans to conduct a pilot study of in situ chemical oxidation treatment of fuel-contaminated soil in the former Main Operations Complex. The cleanup entails that equipment and supplies are brought to the island by barges landing at Kitnagak Bay and a work camp would be set up near the existing airfield. The Corps' environmental assessment determined that the actions will have minor short-term impacts on the environment but would improve the long term overall quality of the project environment. Between 1994 and 2005, the Corps removed containerized hazardous and toxic wastes and demolished structures at Northeast Cape. The former radar and communications facilities are located 60 miles southeast of the village of Savoonga. No public meeting is scheduled on the cleanup, but comments can be submitted by June 28 to: Christopher.B.Floyd@usace.army.mil.

Early walrus count results alarm conservation group

(AP)—A partial federal assessment of Pacific walrus estimates their minimum population at just 15,164 but says the count likely missed a number of animals. The estimate released last week only represents animals counted in about half of walrus habitats in the Bering and Chukchi seas and does not account for animals that were in water rather than on ice. A 1990 aerial survey estimated the walrus population at 201,039 in the region. The count was done by U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service in response to a court deadline requiring the agency to identify marine mammal stocks most affected by interactions with commercial fishing. The Center for Biological Diversity has petitioned to list walrus as an endangered species because of the impact of global warming on Arctic sea ice.

State intervenes in Outer Continental Shelf oil lease sale litigation

The State of Alaska last week has moved to intervene in a federal court case in which the Native Village of Point Hope seeks to rescind dozens of leases issued by the federal government under an offshore oil and gas lease sale conducted for federal waters in the Chukchi Sea. Newly appointed and sworn in attorney general Dan Sullivan said that he would "vigilantly safeguard and defend Alaska's interests," particularly those relating to economic opportunities for Alaskans and the balance of state and federal rights and responsibilities. "This case entails both such interests," he said.

The Point Hope plaintiffs contend that the decision by the U.S. Mineral Management Service to conduct the lease sale for the Outer Continental Shelf, along with the environmental impact statement underlying that action, violated federal law, including the Endangered Species Act. The lawsuit seeks to void all of the leases issued in the sale. If successful, the lawsuit could delay development of the OCS for decades. Although the lawsuit is against the federal government, ConocoPhillips, Shell and now the State of Alaska have intervened. AG Sullivan said that the state's interest in the matter is that oil and gas industry is the largest employer in Alaska and that the industry's taxes account for 90 percent of the general fund revenue for state government.

Runners hit the beach in search of gold at annual Dash

By Tyler Rhodes

Well before the fire engines and floats took to Front Street Saturday, a parade of runners and walkers strode and streamed down the beach east of town for the 2009 Gold Dust Dash.

High schooler Teddy Payenna dominated the race, taking the lead shortly after the start and never giving it up. Payenna finished the 4-mile race in 24 minutes and 34 seconds. Tyler Rhodes took the runner-up honors, finishing nearly a minute later.

Shanna Moeder claimed the win for the women, finishing in 33:17. Caitlin Tozier was the next woman to cross the line, marking a time of 36:19.

Nearly 70 ran and walked along the Bering Sea from East-end Beach almost to the mouth of the Nome River before making a U-turn and heading back to the start. Some zigzagged to avoid the waves of the incoming tide while others plodded through the water, preferring wet feet to the energy-sapping dry sand.

Both Payenna and Moeder received gold nuggets for their wins. Payenna was doubly lucky, taking home a second nugget won through a drawing.

Nome loves a parade

The band was back on display on the back of a flatbed truck a few hours later along with dozens of Nome's organizations and entities for the annual Midnight Sun Parade up and down Front Street. Joining the requisite fire trucks and ambulances, several groups created floats to honor this year's theme of "50 Years under the Midnight Sun," in honor of Alaska's five decades of statehood. Nome Elementary School's entry in the parade, a monstrous blue and gold birthday cake followed by a large group of young candle-carriers took the top prize for floats, earning $100 from the Nome Convention and Visitors Bureau.

Some of Nome's youngest residents tossed candy at their peers and children of all ages as they rode on the Nome Preschool Association's float. The candy-throwers not only pleased the eager kids that lined both sides of Front Street, the contest judges also smiled upon them, awarding the entourage as the best youth float. The association also received $100.

Also honored with a $100 prize was the King Island float. Members of the King Island community drummed and danced for nearly an hour on a trailer as the parade worked its way west on Front Street, executed a loop and returned eastward to the state building again.

A $50 prize was awarded for the best bike, which went to a cruiser by the name of "Old Yellow." Another $50 was supposed to go to the best skateboard in the parade. However, with no entries, the prize instead went to the best dog. Pooch-owner Cathy Chamberlain, who paraded with a costumed husky and two chihuahua-pomeranian mixes atop a large rolling flower took home the improvised prize.

Joining the prize-winners were floats representing churches, the Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps, Norton Sound Heath Corp.'s CAMP department, a family of cavemen parodying the GEICO insurance commercials, The Arctic ICANS Relay for Life, and the Nome-Beltz class of 1989, among others.

The good guys win again

The crowds didn't wander far after the parade finished its lap around downtown. Some sampled the barbecue chicken served by the Lions Club as they waited for the next show to begin. Sure enough, at high noon at the Wells Fargo Bank, they were not disappointed.

Good guys with guns, not-so-good guys also toting firearms, ladies of ill repute and others, all donning turn-of-the-century costumes, set the scene for Nome's annual bank robbery. As the peaceful scene unfurled before the bank, heads could be seen turning westward along Front Street. In the distance a gang of questionable character spread across the street, heading straight for the bank. Leading the charge was Ken Shapiro, who stood out in the crowd of miscreants not so much for what he had on, but for what he didn't. Wearing only his long red underwear, Shapiro called out that he was going to find the unlucky person who stole his pants.

When the gang arrived at the bank, a short gunfight ensued. Shapiro relieved the fight's loser of his coat. As Sheriff Wyatt Earp, who looked a lot like Nome's Arlo Hannigan, talked matters over with Shapiro, other members of the gang slipped inside the bank. Shapiro soon raised the stakes when he lighted the fuse of a stack of dynamite and walked into the bank himself. A deafening boom followed and bank employees were soon seeing fleeing the building—one noticeably missing his pants. Shapiro, now fully clothed, emerged with his gang.

Earp and his men, however, couldn't let the mayhem stand unanswered and corralled the robbers with a volley of gunfire. With only a few men left standing, the robbers pledged to be good and emptied their loot on the ground. It didn't stay there long, however. The piles of candy that flowed from the bags were quickly pounced

A quick swim

With the sun still dominating the cloudless sky, a healthy crowd pushed eastward after the robbery performance to the beach. Where runners and walkers had previously traveled along the shore that morning, the masses during the afternoon would point themselves south for the annual Polar Bear Swim. Encouraged by the bright sunshine and a raging palette bonfire, dozens of brave souls charged into the Bering Sea for a brief swim. Those who dunked themselves in the chilly water were rewarded with a certificate to prove they lacked the good sense to stay out of water that could quickly render them hypothermic.

Some achieved the feat with a quick in-and-out dunking, while thicker-skinned participants actually executed some swim strokes in the chilly water. Many tan-challenged folks came out of the water with a red glow to them. Nearly all who emerged from the sea returned to the beach with a smile.

Following the swim, sun-soaked revelers could duck inside the elementary school for a big serving of Nome's talent and goodies at the Folk Fest Main Stage event. The Main Stage event features 10-minute musical performances, mostly of local acts, but also from visitors.

Nome's talent takes the stage

Nearly 20 acts filled the bill at this year's event, delivering everything from Nikki Polk's heartfelt folk songs to Andrew Cooper's searing Gibson Flying V electric guitar playing Ozzy Osbourne tunes. Greg Mitchell and his crew, which included Charlie Painter, Megan Hahn, Jimi Adams, Ron Horner and Bonnie Hahn, again put some theatrics into their performance as Miss Bonnie and the Wyld Earps. Festival headliners, The Great Alaska Bluegrass Band, grabbed the stage for an extended set.

While the show rolled on in the school's commons, the gym hosted a couple dozen booths offering food and crafts. A hungry visitor could find anything from a pulled pork sandwich and pizza to ulus and mas-sages. Shopping and eating didn't mean missing out on the show. A wall-sized screen and speakers pumped both audio and video of the show into the gym.

After four solid hours of music, several of the festival's performers gathered on stage to sing "Goodnight Irene" together, most adding a verse of their own to the tune.

Rains yield for raft race

If it floats, it was probably part of someone's raft on Sunday. The Bering Sea Lions Club Nome River Raft Race annually tests the ingenuity and competitive drive of a host of Nomeites. While most of the homemade rafts entered exhibit some signs of ingenuity, the competitive drive usually only applies to the first half of the field. The back-of-the-packers are most often out for a pleasure cruise.

After nothing but sunshine since Thursday, this year's race appeared threatened by poor weather as Sunday dawned with pounding rain. Un-

Shutterbugs snap Alaska, reveal hidden gems

Alaska Wilderness League and Alaska Wilderness Recreation and Tourism Association teamed up in May on a national photography contest to highlight national park-quality public lands managed by the Bureau of Land Management in Alaska. The Alaska's Hidden Gems Photography Contest attracted 61 submissions from all over and had 50 that qualified for entry. Sue Steinacher of Nome was the overall contest winner and placed first in the Wildlife category. Sue has lived in Nome off and on since the mid-1980s and considers it one of Alaska's best kept secrets. In September 2007, while camping with friends from Fairbanks in the Kigluai Mountains, some 60 miles north of Nome on the Seward Peninsula, and watching the sun rise on the north face of the "Kigs," she heard the gargling of the approaching cranes and grabbed her camera for the winning shot. "The opportunity to enjoy these magnificent mountains and the refuge they provide to the wildlife we value, are what sustains most of us who tough it out year after year in this distant northwest corner of Alaska," says Sue.

Wagon Wheel rounds up Nome aviators

By Janice Doherty

Larry Eggart's dream of hosting an aviators' weekend getaway after almost 20 years of hoping it would all come together one day proved to be a success. Nine private aircraft parked on the colorful, wild-flower covered tundra strip throughout the day on Saturday, June 13. The location was 71 miles east of Nome just past Council among the majestic bright green cottonwood trees and the sound of the ice-cold

Wagon Wheel Creek rushing by. Magenta woolly lousewort and cobalt blue forget-me-nots adorned the Alaskan tundra as the aviation enthusiasts enjoyed the picnic and campout weekend.

Private aviators from Nome who participated in the event included the following: Larry Eggart and Darlene Whitney in their Maule, Lynn Johnson in his Taylorcraft, Victor Olsen in his Piper PA-12, Debbie and Tony Parsons in their Piper PA-

11, Simon and Jennifer Kinneen in their Piper PA-14, Tony and Angie Gorn in their Piper PA-12, Jay Wieler in his Piper PA-18, Sean Bogart and Sterling Ambrose in Sean's Citabria and Doug and Janice Doherty in their Cessna 170B.

The temperatures reached a balmy 75°F on Saturday afternoon as the pilots compared Alaskan Bush wheels and shared many Alaskan aviation experiences. The children, including Gavin and Kellen Kinneen and Erica and Landon Wieler played hide and seek in the bushes and chased each other with light sabers. A beautifully decorated cake with 28 candles surprised Jennifer Kinneen as the aviators sang happy birthday to her. After the children went to sleep, a wine and cheese tasting took place.

A nesting raven caring for her recently hatched fledglings entertained the group with their loud squawks. Those who chose to camp out for the evening woke up to a big Alaskan breakfast prepared by Doug Doherty and Sean Bogart before they all flew back to Nome. This event will be held annually during the second weekend of June, weather permitting. Interested aviation enthusiasts may contact Larry Eggart of Nome for more details.

Assault, weapon misconduct land Teller man in jail

A Teller man was arrested Tuesday morning on assault and weapons charges after Alaska State Troopers responded to a call about an intoxicated man with a gun in the village west of Nome.

According to Trooper Sgt. Andrew Merrill of the Nome Post,

David Soolook Jr., 46, was arrested and charged with assault in the third degree, third- and fourth-degree misconduct involving weapons, and two counts of reckless endangerment.

Merrill said Troopers received the call at 6 a.m. Tuesday, and responded from Nome by both aircraft and car. Merrill said Soolook's girlfriend received minor injuries in the incident, requiring a visit to the Teller clinic. Merrill said no further care was needed. He also said alcohol was involved.

Troopers Merrill, Ann Sears and John Stroebele responded to the call. Soolook was scheduled to be arraigned Tuesday afternoon in District Court in Nome.

HOROSCOPES

  CAPRICORN December 22–January 19   Time to get the ball rolling on that home improvement project, Capricorn. It cannot wait any longer. A health issue rears its ugly head once again.	  ARIES March 21–April 19   You're much too smart to fall into that trap. Resist it with all of your might, Aries. Travel is on the agenda. The best destination is not far from home.	  CANCER June 22–July 22   You race to the finish, but will you make it, Cancer? Only time will tell, and much sooner than you think. A friend reaches out to you; don't turn a deaf ear.	  LIBRA September 23–October 22   Passion sizzles at home, and you wine and dine that special someone. All of the pieces of the puzzle come into place at work, except for one. Don't drop the ball, Libra.
  AQUARIUS January 20–February 18   Up and at 'em, Aquarius. All eyes are on you to come up with the perfect solution to a dilemma. The message at home is clear. Heed it.	  TAURUS April 20–May 20   Pick a side at home, Taurus, and you will be doomed. They are both right. Say so and make your exit. A financial snafu works out in your favor.	  LEO July 23–August 22   Push the envelope too much, Leo, and you just might find yourself in hot water. Pull back and give someone else the reins. A home repair goes well with the right materials.	  SCORPIO October 23–November 21   Get it, Scorpio, got it. That's how quick you are this week. Your mind goes into overdrive, and the ideas fly. A cheeky young friend takes you someplace extra-special.
  PISCES February 19–March 20   Magic is about to happen. Anything will be possible, Pisces, so go forth and shine. A young friend asks the very question you hoped they wouldn't. Be honest.	  GEMINI May 21–June 21   You can dish it out, but can you take it, Gemini? The answer to that question comes this week. Bits and pieces at home turn into one awesome product.	  VIRGO August 23–September 22   You're flip-flopping on an issue, and it isn't cool. State your opinion, Virgo. It is essential for the situation to progress. Sighs at home indicate that something is up.	  SAGITTARIUS November 22–December 21   Time to make amends, Sagittarius. You opened mouth, inserted foot and what transpired afterwards was quite the mess. This is not something that will blow over. You must act now.

Saying it Sincerely

By Pastors David and Julie Elmore from Community United Methodist Church
for the Nome Ministerial Association

Bible Reference: Acts 2: 1-21

Several weeks ago we celebrated Pentecost Sunday. Red is the color of Pentecost, reminding us of the power of the Holy Spirit; that it burns like the tongues of fire that rested upon each person in this passage from the book of Acts. But more than just being powerful, the Holy Spirit symbolizes change. After Pentecost, the church was forever changed. Our passage says that all people were able to hear the Gospel, God’s good news, in their own language. And the change goes deeper than that. Luke, who most believe to have written the book of Acts, saw this occasion as the fulfillment of Joel’s prophecy: “In the last days it will be, God declares, that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams. Even upon my slaves, both men and women, in those days I will pour out my Spirit; and they shall prophesy. And I will show portents in the heaven above and signs on the earth below, blood, and fire, and smoky mist. The sun shall be turned to darkness and the moon to blood, before the coming of the Lord’s great and glorious day. Then everyone who calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved.” (Acts 2:17-21)

It seems as if the Church has fallen a bit short at times of God’s will as revealed at Pentecost. There are many in our region who at one point were not allowed to even speak their own language, much less to hear the gospel in it. That is one reason why it is so important that we continue the tradition of singing hymns translated into the languages of this region. The Holy Spirit transcends language and culture. Who needs a translator when we have the Holy Spirit in our lives?

Dr. Lovett Weems, United Methodist Professor of Church Leadership, says that if we refuse to change we are essentially saying that the Kingdom of God has been brought to completion. Certainly we have a long way to go before we say God’s reign is present in its fullness. Calling people to faithful, committed discipleship to Jesus Christ is not easy. Sometimes it may even be painful. God never promised us things would be easy – God only promised us the peace that comes from knowing God. The promise of Pentecost is that as we remain faithful, and even if we may fall away a bit, God is faithful and through the Holy Spirit God is with us on this journey no matter how tough. No matter what unexpected turns this journey may take. As we seek to be God’s people and faithful disciples, Pentecost tells us we are not alone on that journey. Thanks be to God!

The Ahnangnatoguk family would like to inform the friends and family of Carol Ann Outwater that her burial service will be held at the Nome Cemetery at 1 p.m. on June 26, 2009.

(CWA). The environmental consequences of this construction activity include massive discharges of sediment-laden stormwater in 2007, 2008 and now presently occurring in 2009. In 2007 and 2008 the disturbed areas had few of the erosion control measures in place that should have been implemented through a NPDES stormwater permit. Adequate measures to control contaminant releases to the nearby three streams were not taken during the construction of the Rock Creek Mine. The fill material impacted the three perennial coastal streams. There is strong evidence that the receiving waters of the Snake River were also impacted. These alterations diminished the value of the coastal streams as habitat for the native aquatic life, such as salmon and other fish. The sedimentation events occurred when salmon eggs were in the streambed, depleting them of oxygen. The property started in earnest to stabilize particularly vulnerable areas of the property to reduce the ongoing erosion risks, but this attempt failed resulting in contamination in May and June of 2009 of all three streams, especially Lindblom Creek. A digital photo taken on June 12, 2009 was taken of Lindblom Creek at the Glacier Creek Rd. There should be related State enforcement actions against the Rock Creek Mine. SECOND JUDICIAL DISTRICT
IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF: )
ERNIE W. BUTTS,

sult of the CWA violations described above, under the settlement the Alaska Gold Company and NovaGold Resources, Inc. will pay fines totaling $883,628 to resolve violations of a stormwater discharge permit. The Need for Injunctive Relief: In order to repair damage caused by the companies I strongly recommend additional monies be paid by the company to improve overall site stabilization to prevent further erosion and restoration of stream segments at three sites on the property. The cost of these measures will more than likely exceed $ 2,000,000. Site Stabilization – Under additional conditions of the settlement, work should continue to stabilize portions of the property vulnerable to erosion. This should include such measures as completion of a soil “nail wall” to stabilize the slopes of the waste rock and development rock mounds as well as the sides of the Tailings Storage Facility (TSF). Erosion control needs to be maintained in the future on roadways that are used on the property. Terracing slopes, and planting and maintaining vegetation cover should be used to control erosion at this site, including the barren ridges of earthen fill. For all required vegetation, the settlement also needs to require the control of invasive plant species and use native grasses and shrubs such as willows. These stabilization measures should start to take place prior to freeze-up this year. It would be prudent for the U.S. to do this in a

Romantic tryst on Middle Beach ends in jail

A couple who perhaps got too caught up in the Midnight Sun festivities last weekend are facing indecent exposure charges after allegedly getting a little too close and personal

Saturday on the beach in Nome. The Nome Police Department said it received a call June 20, reporting a couple having sex in the Middle Beach area. Officers responded and arrested Camille Droman, 43, and Andrew Ozenna, 23, charging them both with misdemeanor charges of indecent exposure. According to a press release from the police department, a subsequent investigation led to additional charges of being a fugitive from justice levied against Droman. Police say she has an active warrant against her in Lake County, Fla., for possession of methamphetamine and three counts of possession of paraphernalia. As of Tuesday morning, she was awaiting extradition to Florida. Ozenna was arraigned June 22. A pre-trial conference on the matter was set for Aug. 5.

timely matter as NovaGold Resources, Inc. today has no source of income or cash flow and may remedy the situation by declaring bankruptcy.

Stream Restoration – Under this additional settlement the channels of all three creeks and the inflow areas of the creeks that enter the Snake River should be carefully analyzed because channel restoration may be needed due to the cumulative effects from the contamination and the future probable effects that may happen for a number of years.

Tailing Storage Facility – Today the facility is filled with over 50 million gallons of water in a storage dam that was not designed to hold water, but paste mill tailings. The area of the recycle mill pond also needs to be addressed.

Monitoring of stream conditions and vegetation to ensure that performance criteria in the new agreement have been met should follow all work on the slopes and waterways.

Payment of Penalties: As a result of the CEA violations already settled and agreed upon by the permittee of $883,628. This is the second largest fine in Region 10 but it is certainly not the largest fine for a NPDES Permit violation in the United States.

The additional fines for restoration will represent a significant deterrent to others who disregard Federal and State erosion control requirements. I would estimate that the new restoration work and extensive repair work would cost between $2.0 Million to $5.0 Million.

This new additional settlement will reduce erosion at the Rock Creek Mine, restore perennial stream systems, including surrounding native plant habitats, and will lead to cleaner, safer streams and coastal waters.

Respectfully submitted,

daunted by wind or rain—all the teams were bound to be wet anyway—a strong field crowded the start at Mile 13 of the Kougark Road. The teams were to be rewarded for their effort as the rains tempered by the race's start and the sun broke through within an hour of the cannon's blast that sent the teams on their way.

The rules of the race are pretty simple. All rafts must be homemade, manned by at least four crewmembers, and non-motorized. All crewmembers must be entirely wet by the finish line.

This year's winners, the Howling Dogs, squeaked out the win in 1 hour, 23 minutes, just one minute ahead of the runners-up. The team named Truman Johnson their captain in memory along with Barnaby Longley. Crewmembers were Kyle Griemsmann, Willis Pate, Ricky Wideman, Steffan Cox and Landis Bjorgen. The second-place finishers, the Kigluaik Adventure, was captained by Lieudell Goldsberry and crewed by Andrew Goldsberry, Chris Busk, Dempsey Woods, Banner Romenesko and Larry Pederson. The third-place team finished 11 minutes back from the winners. That crew, the Green Machine, was made up of captain Miles Reader, Brittney Carpenter, Jackie Reader, Rachael Bauman and Cody Robson. The top three teams received trophies.

The rafts came in all shapes and sizes. Many were a simple slab design made of plywood and Styrofoam while others incorporated various airtight containers for float. The more serious crafts were pared down to the most basic elements, requiring the crew to kneel and paddle. Others were designed for comfort with chairs (often made of coolers), perhaps a table for playing dice and various equipment for spraying water at other teams and spectators.

While some took much more time than others did, all the teams reportedly made it to the finish safely.

ishing note on the festival with one last show at the elementary school Sunday evening. Put to work nearly the entire time they were in Nome, the band was still able to crank out beautiful three-part harmonies and hot picking through its deep repertoire of traditional bluegrass music.

By 9 p.m. the show was over, the seats stacked and the crowd on their way home. Many were likely bound to pull the shades on the longest day of the year to get some rest before work resumed Monday after what is arguably the longest and most fun weekend of the year in Nome.

Snake River Bridge to move

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Joint Utility System staff and board have a plan to replace the decrepit Snake River Bridge with a new crossing closer to town.

That's the bridge that has Band-Aids all over it to keep roadbed material from sifting into the water. New money came down the hopper for the bridge replacement from the state's voters approving a road package last November.

Proposed plans call for laying the bridge across the river at the beginning of the broad curve of Seppala Drive east of the Center Creek Road intersection. Placement under study calls for the port area end of the bridge to come out near the south end of the new power plant. Such an alternative would require road realignment on Seppala between Center Creek and Cemetery roads to provide an intersection for the bridge approach.

The state Department of Transportation, declaring support for the project, has agreed to lease land adjacent to the north end of the new power plant to NJUS and

Skinny crabs close fish plant

By Laurie McNicholas

The Norton Sound Seafood Products plant in Nome reportedly stopped issuing bait and ice to commercial red king crab fishermen June 22 after receiving complaints from customers about insufficient meat fill in the legs of crab purchased from the plant. Crab fishermen told The Nome Nugget the plant would suspend operations for two weeks.

Meanwhile, the Norton Sound commercial red king crab fishery remains open because Lamar Ballard of AquaTech, an Anchorage firm that buys crab from Unalakleet fisherman Clarence Towarak, sampled crab in Towarak's first delivery and found the legs filled with crab meat. Ballard attached photos of the samples showing cross-sections of meat-filled crab legs to a July 24 e-mail to Joyce Soong, fisheries biologist with the Alaska Department of Fish and Game in Nome.

Rich Ferry, NSSP's northern region operations manager, provided the following

Council calls for internationally binding Arctic Sea laws

By Diana Haecker

A busy future lies in store for the Arctic Ocean as thinning sea ice potentially opens the window for commercial marine traffic to traverse the ocean on top of the world in the summer, concludes a multi-national shipping report commissioned by the Arctic Council.

To keep the environment protected while developing the Arctic sustainably, the 200-page Arctic Marine Shipping Assessment report recommends creating uniform shipping regulations across the Arctic for safety and environmental protection, to take measures protecting Arctic people and the environment, and to build marine infrastructure, communication systems, ports, ice information services and to provide ice navigation training.

Scientists predict that multi-year sea ice is seriously declining and may be gone by the summer of 2015. "It is highly plausible there will be greater marine access and longer seasons of navigation, except perhaps during winter, but not necessarily less difficult ice conditions for marine operations," says the report.

Although the International Maritime Organization has developed guidelines for ships operating in Arctic ice-covered waters, those recommendations are voluntary and not binding. "There are no uniform, international standards for ice navigators and for Arctic safety and survival for seafarers in polar conditions," the report states. Also, there are no mandatory environmental standards developed by the IMO for ships in Arctic waters.

With more traffic and resource development, the report identifies the No. 1 threat as an oil spill. But a response to such a disaster would be nearly impossible. "The lack of marine infrastructure in all but a limited number of areas, coupled with the vastness and harshness of the environment, makes conduct of emergency response significantly more difficult in the Arctic," the report concludes.

The lack of an international marine regulatory framework combined with natural re-

Push for detox center still has strong backing

By Tyler Rhodes

Leaders of a wide cross-section of Nome's agencies and organizations gathered June 18 to continue working on a roadmap toward providing services and treatment for those suffering from substance abuse and chronic homelessness in the region.

The roundtable-style meeting served as a follow-up to an April 9 community meeting centered on developing some sort of residential treatment facility in Nome. Like that April meeting, the most recent gathering was organized by Norton Sound Health Corp. and was open to the public.

The June 18 meeting drew more than two dozen people to Old St. Joe's Hall to hear of the progress made by various groups and agencies seeking to address the problem in both the long and short term.

Norton Sound Health Corp. is working with a $50,000 grant from the Alaska Mental Health Trust Authority to evaluate the need and feasibility of providing a detoxification and treatment facility. The hospital was awarded another $100,000 from the authority for further planning and feasibility studies in fiscal year 2010.

The large group meetings pulling together the people and organizations that fit into the larger picture of serving those in need are part of that evaluation.

Much of the early discussion at the meeting centered on the work of the Nome Emergency Shelter Team, an ad-hoc group that has worked to tackle the issues of homelessness and substance abuse treatment since

Letters

Dear Nancy,

I have these thoughts regarding what I heard on the radio this morning. Thank you.

The city council votes for a flop house over a leadership program for young people. Who owns them? Perhaps they should learn the difference between helping and enabling. No one likes to see drunks staggering along Front Street in the middle of the day. So stop serving! In this environment, alcohol does not need to flow before the end of the work-day. If that impacts the ill gotten gains of our liquor vendors and city fathers, maybe we need some pain. We live in tough times. Repeat offenders and those without work should not be served. Period! I am sure that the hospital, police, and social services could formulate a short list for that purpose. You know who they are. Need shelter? Stay at home. Want to party? Pay your way, but make sure that you have a room beforehand. Don't like it? Get out and work to earn your American dream. See how easy it is. Stop wallowing in your self pity at government expense. We all pay. City council— think about the future. Make a decision that takes some guts and support your youth. They are our future and deserve the expense. Break the chain and stop wasting time and money.

Independence Day

Let's look forward to the day when Nome is energy independent. We probably have more of a need for energy independence than any other community in the USA. We are isolated and depend on the fuel oil barons for our ability to keep the lights on, our homes heated and our engines running.

We have the resources and the brains to be energy independent. We just need the will power and resolve to get planning for fuel cells to power our trucks and ATVs. We need to harness the energy of the sun to heat our solar panels. We need to arrange for battery charging stations because the trucks and ATVs of the not too distant future will probably not rely on the internal combustion engine. Hopefully we will see an array of wind turbines cranking our energy for Nome Joint Utilities to sell us at an affordable cost.

We can't become victims of circumstance by letting ourselves be dragged kicking and screaming into alternative energy generation. We must go forth boldly and encourage Nome Joint Utilities to provide leadership in promoting our independence from OPEC, British Petroleum, Standard Oil and the West Coast oil refinery price controllers. So, Nomeites, let's get started on our Declaration of Independence. Happy Fourth of July. — N.L.M.—

You can travel a minute out of town and be granted a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to see a beaver swimming free in a tundra pond, right next to a migratory duck and see here eggs far beyond the touch of human hands. Any one of us can drive down to the Nome River and catch salmon or the Snake River for salmon, trout and tomcod.

I believe this is why we hold Nome precious to our souls.

So my question is, why do we allow foreign peoples to continuously injure our waters and our lands? Many are very conscientious, like Quality Asphalt. They plan many of their projects like the Unalakleet Airport Project well over a year in advance. Why does this double standard exist?

Please let your heart be your guide and deny the Moonlight Watershed Permit to anybody, any entity, and person who violates the federal Clean Water Act, which includes the "willful" act of burying used oil in our watershed in Anvil Mountain and then covering it up— putting our drinking water in harm's way.

I prefer the beavers, ducks, and fish to the unrealistic promise of finding the glitter of gold in dem dare hills.

The truth is never sexy; neither is one million pounds of cyanide stored next to the ball field.

Oh, I forgot about the groups of reindeer we often see alongside our roads.

Sincerely,
Dr. Derrick Leedy
Nome, Alaska

Dr. Leedy will be out of town for the next City Council Meeting on Monday July 13. He encourages all the good folks of Nome to let our good council members know their feelings.

OVER THE TOP—Nome has always celebrated the Fourth of July in a most enthusiastic way. The pole vault taking place at Barrack's Square in 1909 was a crowd favorite. This year we celebrate 50 years of Statehood under the Midnight Sun. Be a part of the fun this Fourth of July — it's a Nome family tradition!

60 sign up for Iditarod 2010

WASILLA— During the annual musher and volunteer picnic at the Iditarod Trail Committee headquarters in Wasilla, 60 mushers appeared in person or sent in their entries for the 2010 Iditarod Trail Sled Dog race. Saturday, June 27 marked the first day of signup for the race. Mushers hailing from Alaska, the lower 48, Canada, Scotland and even Jamaica handed in their sign-up paperwork and the newly increased entry fee of $4,000. Citing increased costs to put on the race, the ITC has increased the entry fee from $1,875 in 2007 to $3,000 in 2008 and $4,000 for this year's race.

Four-time Iditarod champions Jeff King and Martin Buser, three-time Iditarod champion Lance Mackey and 2004 champion Mitch Seavey entered the race as well as 19 rookies. From western Alaska, Kotzebue veterans John Baker and Robert Nelson are listed, but longtime racer and 2005 runner-up Ed Iten's name is missing. However, Iten's son Quinn Iten is making a bid for the first time in the race. Also new to the Iditarod is Unalakleet's William "Middie" Johnson. The racers compete for a purse of $630,000 with $610,000 paid out to the top 30 finishers, and $1,049 apiece for the rest of the pack. A lottery waiving the entry fee is held among those mushers at the picnic. This year's winners are Kotzebue musher Robert Nelson and four-time champion Jeff King.

Prior to the countdown for the 2010 racing season, ITC has enacted a few new rules, including that mushers get to draw for their starting position in the order of their sign up either in person or by mail. It used to be that only mushers in person got to be in the first draw for starting position. Another new rule for 2012 is that rookies have to log at least 750 miles in pre-qualifying races. This is up from 500 miles that were historically required. The ITC is also finalizing a mechanism to a new rule that enforces drug testing of mushers. The next Iditarod starts March 7 in Anchorage, with the restart taking place in Willow.

Don Young seeks reelection

ANCHORAGE (AP)— U.S. Rep. Don Young, Alaska's sole representative in the U.S. House for a majority of statehood, announced Monday he would seek re-election in 2010. Young, 76, filed with the Division of Elections and said he wanted to make it clear to potential challengers that he was in the race. "We decided it was best to get it out on the table," he said. The Republican was re-elected last year despite facing federal investigations of his connections to an Alaska businessman convicted of bribing state lawmakers and an earmark in a spending bill that benefited a campaign supporter. He defeated former House Minority Leader Ethan Berkowitz, an Anchorage Democrat, in the 2008 race. He faced a stiffer challenge in the Republican primary, beating Lt. Gov. Sean Parnell by 304 votes.

House approves climate change bill

On Friday, the U.S. House of Representatives approved a sweeping climate change bill that would limit carbon dioxide emissions, require increases in renewable energy usage and mandates consumer products to be more energy efficient. The bill goes into effect in 2012 and had vast support among Democrats and President Barack Obama.

By a vote of 219-212 the House approved the bill. Only eight Republicans voted for the bill and 44 Democrats defected from their party to vote against it.

The bill – if adopted by the Senate in September – would force cuts in domestic greenhouse-gas emissions by 17 percent in 2020 and 83 percent in 2050 through a cap-and-trade permit system on heavy emitters and the oil and gas industry. It also would mandate greater renewable energy usage, boost appliance and building efficiency standards and pay for domestic and overseas plant and forest conservation. The measure drew fire from Alaska's Congressman Don Young, who voted No on the bill. Young said that the bill amounts to a national energy tax bill that will raise electricity and gas prices and would export American jobs overseas. "This is a sad day for America, and I mean that from the bottom of my heart," Young said in a statement. "The smart thing to do would be to develop our fossil fuels and use that money to develop alternative forms of energy, but instead, the Majority wants to play the part of global martyr. China and India can keep pumping all the pollutants they want into the atmosphere, and we'll fall on our sword and accept responsibility. That's absolute nonsense!" Young said.

Senator Lisa Murkowski also released a statement saying that the bill is not a solution to climate change but seems to be pushed through for political reasons. "This bill was forced through the House in a process designed to minimize open, transparent debate and preclude a thorough analysis of what the bill actually does," Murkowski said.

Feds, state work together on spring flooding recovery

Governor Sarah Palin and Federal Emergency Management Agency administrator Dennis Hunsinger signed a disaster response agreement last week. The agreement allows for federal participation in the spring flooding disaster recovery on the Yukon and Kuskokwim Rivers. FEMA has set up a state-feds joint field office in Anchorage to manage the federal response to the flooding. From the state's side, the Alaska Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Management is involved and helps people affected by the spring flooding.

early last winter. Made up of representatives from nearly a dozen community entities, NEST was able to pull together an emergency shelter that opened for 22 nights since March when the temperature dropped to -10° F or colder.

The shelter, operated out of the Nazarene Church, required a large amount of volunteer effort and donations to work. "This past winter was such a collaboration of so many people," said NEST member and Nome Community Center employee Abby Huggins. As NEST looks toward the coming winter, it is working to find a facility since the Nazarene Church will no longer be available. "A space is what we really have to secure," Huggins told the gathering.

NEST did gain some support from the City of Nome when it allocated $10,000 in its budget to support the organization.

Over the coldest period of the winter, the shelter was open every night for more than two weeks. Besides making a difference for those who were able to sleep in a warm space, the impact was also noticeable for other organizations. The hospital saw a dramatic decrease in emergency room admissions. The Wellness Forum's Safety Patrol, which walks the streets to ensure people are not posing a risk to themselves or others, was relieved to have a place to which they could escort those who may have risked passing out outside in the fatally cold conditions.

"We would walk them up there. We knew they were warm and safe, and they would not perish," said Berda Willson of the Wellness Forum. Willson is also a member of the NSHC Board of Directors.

It was also suggested at the meeting that having the shelter open perhaps meant some of its guests were more likely to leave the bar earlier since they would not have to prolong their stay to closing time in an effort to stay warm longer.

Speakers also said it is important to note that not all guests at the shelter suffered from alcohol abuse.

Without a shelter as an option, those too inebriated to care for themselves will often be taken to Anvil Mountain Correctional Center for a protective hold. If those picked up blow above a certain amount when given a breathalyzer test, the correctional facility cannot hold them and they are brought to the hospital.

Colleen Meyer, inpatient and ER nursing director at the hospital, detailed many of the problems the emergency room and inpatient areas face when having to deal with inebriated patients delivered to their doors. Injured nurses, occupied beds when other patients may need them and the disruption to other patients and staff are among the problems experienced. "A lot of our beds in our ER are filled up with people who don't really need to be there," Meyer said.

"We did notice a drop-off when NEST was open," she said at the meeting. "Now we're back to the old way."

Meyer said the fallout of dealing with chronic inebriates lasts beyond the time that the patients are in the facility. Nurses and staff burn out. Seeing someone in such a destructive cycle also takes its toll. "When there is a death, it's hard. We see them at their worst. We see their clothes and take care of them," she said. "The impact is huge, and the loss is huge."

While much of the meeting focused on the short-term work conducted by NEST and the issues the community as a whole is confronting, facilitator Mary Elizabeth Rider also turned the discussion toward the future and what the community ultimately wants to see as a response to the problem.

Rider, who was hired by NSHC to help in the planning effort, lauded the volunteerism exhibited in Nome, citing the Safety Patrol and NEST volunteers, as well as the showing for the large-group planning meetings. "That's not happening anywhere else in the state," Rider said.

In addition to NSHC's long-term planning effort, there is another facet to NEST also looking toward the future. As NEST formed, it developed the two groups to deal with the immediate problem of people freezing to death on the streets of Nome and the longer-term issue of setting up a system to deal with the multiple reasons people end up facing the risk of death by exposure in the middle of town.

The NEST long-term effort is not entirely independent of the hospital's. Much of the effectiveness of NEST—for both the short- and long-term groups—can be attributed to its makeup of members who work for most of the organizations who can or will play a role in addressing the issue. NEST members include representatives from the hospital, Nome Community Center, Nome Eskimo Community, Kawerak Inc., churches, the Bering Sea Women's Group and many others.

Part of the long-term planning is lining out the roles all those organizations will play in whatever plan gets developed. "We're trying to see how that [long-term NEST] group fits into this," said Kawerak's Melanie Edwards, who works with the long-term NEST group.

"Norton Sound Health Corp. is committed to medical detox and residential treatment," NSHC's Melissa Boeckmann said. "We're hoping for after-care to be taken care of by Kawerak."

Sara Neubauer, who works for Kawerak providing vocational rehabilitation training, said her program could dovetail in nicely with a treatment center. "We could come in and help [treatment center residents] be financially secure," she said. "If we get this up and running, I feel we can make a big difference on our end."

Boeckmann said initial planning efforts picture a detox facility with 16 beds. She said how those 16 beds would break down between use in a residential program and something more temporary was not yet determined. "We're kind of filling in the big picture right now," she said. "We haven't got down to the details yet."

As NSHC makes preparations to move into a new hospital in 2012, the current facility naturally figures large as a potential site for any future treatment facility to be developed. "By 2012 you're going to have this old building as well as this beautiful new building," Rider said. "Is there something that can be done with that facility?"

NSHC board member Willson said her fellow board members are looking for input on potential uses for the old hospital. "The board doesn't want to work in a vacuum in making these decisions," she said.

Boeckmann said the hospital plans to have its services planned out and funded by 2012.

Early visions include a few different services that could be offered to suit those in varying states of need.

Ideas include an emergency shelter for those who are sober but at risk in the elements since they have no other place to stay. For those who are not sober but medically stable, a sleep-off center is envisioned to keep people safe from the elements in a bare-bones facility. Some commented that such a facility should still be dignified and provide support and perhaps referral to other services. A medical detox center would accept those who are not medically stable enough for the sleep-off center.

A long-term treatment center would accept those who want to break the substance abuse cycle. Housing, employment and other support services are envisioned to help those who would successfully complete a treatment program.

As Boeckmann said, NSHC is working toward the medical detox center and a treatment program. Who or what organization would provide other services, such as a sleep-off center or emergency shelter, has yet to be determined.

Discussion also centered on people's social needs after completing a treatment program. "There needs to be a leisure aspect," said NSHC social worker Julie Renwick. "What do you do socially besides going to the bar? ... That term 'hope' is very important. There needs to be something at the end [of treatment]."

Boeckmann said the planning effort is continuing with another large-group meeting planned for sometime this fall.

the City for storing supplies and staging for utility projects as well as the bridge renewal. The bridge project would require NJUS to use this land to relocate other activities and facilities. As the bridge replacement project would start next summer, NJUS needs to start moving materials around now, utility manager John Handeland said. Additionally, the utility and City of Nome are working with DOT for a land disposal to make this site north of the power plant available for construction of a maintenance and operations facility, including replacement of the current NJUS office. NJUS had received notice that a block grant for the full $565,000 necessary was available. Staff was working on matching funds due in November and environmental paperwork to turn the award into real dollars.

In other business June 16, Hande-

land went over the utility's financial statements for May, noting much more than $2 million in accounts receivable with $1.9 million of that due from Alaska Gold Co. on Rock Creek power use. AGC and NJUS had been working on a land swap to pay the bill, but now NJUS has asked NovaGold, the parent company of Alaska Gold, to pay the bill directly in cash, Handeland told the board.

In other business:

• Handeland informed the board that diesel that cost $1.60 per gallon in May was then pushing $2 in June. NJUS already has a supply of high-priced oil for its generators and wouldn't be purchasing any oil this barge season unless the price dropped significantly in September when the last barges float, Handeland said. However, the utility is in negotiations with its buyers' consortium, Western Alaska Fuel Group, to put its bargaining weight behind other member villages needing oil.

• NJUS has received approval to erect a tower on Newton Peak to continue wind energy studies, and meanwhile was negotiating with Bering Straits Development Co. for power entering the grid from the Banner Wind Farm. The wind farm's turbines are still now as adjustments are made to the system, but would be twirling in August, Handeland said.

• Attending the meeting by telephone June 16, board member Berda Willson commented that while NJUS is interested in developing alternative energy, the utility's focus has been on diesel-generated power.

"The utility has to supply reliable energy to the community," she said. "We still need diesel-fired energy capacity if the wind is not blowing or the wind generators are down." Earlier in the meeting, the NJUS board noted that while it was great to be receiving funding to develop wind energy, a major component of such a solution would be storage and transmission.

French sailors work to cross the NW Passage

Approximately 16 months ago Thierry Fabing of France began planning a polar expedition through the Northwest Passage, traveling from the east to the west. In the summer of 2009 he began the next step of his journey, which entailed the same basic route, only backward.

The trip from the west to the east side of the Northwest Passage began on June 5 in Sand Point along the Aleutian Chain and will eventually end in Greenland around the beginning of September.

"The purpose of our polar expedition is to reach Greenland from Alaska. We started on the fifth of June in Sand Point, and now we are in Nome. We want to reach Greenland by the beginning of September," said Patrick Reader, a crewmember from France and the United Kingdom.

The crew is composed of four people, Fabing and Reader, as well as Arielle Corre and Aline Penitot, both from France. In Barrow another member will join their team, Gilles Durand of France. Additionally, Fabing's daughter may connect with them later in the journey.

After the team reaches Greenland, Fabing will find a harbor to park the Baloum Gwen, his sailboat, for one year. He may do several smaller trips to the different coasts of Greenland.

"This is a sport and a human challenge. I don't think it's easy to cross the Northwest Passage," Reader said. "There is always a team of two people who are navigating the sail boat, and the others are sleeping. Every four hours there is a shift change. After only a few days we are quite tired and exhausted, but at the end of the day we are pleased and proud of achieving the expedition."

THE BALOUM GWEN—The trusty sail boat of Skipper Thierry Fabing awaits departure from Nome's harbor last week. Winds and weather recently delayed the French crew's planned travels through the Northwest Passage.

• Arctic

source riches in a brutal and yet biologically fragile environment caused enough alarm for agencies to scramble for the assessment and to prepare for the future. In 2004 the Arctic Council, a forum of the eight Arctic-bordering nations, called for a comprehensive Arctic marine shipping assessment. In April 2009, the assessment report was completed and later signed and agreed upon by all Arctic Council member nations. "This is partially a policy document of the Arctic states as well as a science document—it's a multifaceted, international and negotiated report," said Lawson Brigham, the chairman of the group preparing the report.

In a presentation last week at the University of Alaska at Fairbanks, professor Brigham, also Alaska office director of the U.S. Arctic Research Commission and chairman of the Arctic Marine Shipping Assessment, said that the focus of AMSA was on marine safety and environmental protection.

Brigham showed a satellite photo of the Arctic on Sept. 11, 2007, when both Northwest and the Northeast passages were open for passage. "For the first time in memory, those major straits were completely ice free for 10 days," Lawson said.

Although a warming climate facilitates possible summer sailings in the Arctic, Brigham said climate change is not the main driver for increased marine traffic, but resource development is. Enormous riches lie underneath the ice, productive fisheries ring the Arctic basin on all sides and companies are jockeying for position to develop offshore minerals. "The Arctic is the store house of important resources like oil, gas and other minerals, and maybe fresh water in the future, and also it is important to the transport of these resources to market," Lawson said.

Currently, some of the largest ships sailing the world's oceans are headed to and from the world's biggest zinc mine, Red Dog mine, north of Kotzebue and a huge Russian palladium mine, carrying ore to its processing plants. Other mineral development is planned for Greenland and the Baffin Islands, where plans exist to ship ore from there to steel mills in Europe.

With increased shipping comes the need for more marine infrastructure. Critical infrastructure include ice navigation training centers, navigational charts, communications systems, port services, facilities for ship-generated waste, timely ice information, places of refuge and icebreakers to assist in emergencies.

The Coast Guard frequently pays a visit to Nome, but has no permanent presence in the Gold Rush City. Brigham said that there are no specific plans or recommendations made to establish some sort of Coast Guard presence in Nome. "For the lack of any port in the area, clearly Nome is well poised to provide port and other services," Brigham said.

In addition, a growing cruise ship industry with northern destinations become players in the shipping mix. While many ships have safely traversed the Arctic Ocean in the past, cruise ships worry Lawson because they have no ice-breaking capabilities and there is a lack of search and rescue systems. As an example, Lawson showed slides of a cruise ship that ran into ice in Antarctica in November 2007, due to an operator error and insufficient training of the navigator. The ship sank, but all aboard survived, were scooped up and rescued.

And then there is the issue of governance. Arctic boundaries beyond the 200 nautical miles from the surrounding Arctic mainland are partially disputed by Russia, complicating jurisdictions even more. One of the 17 recommendations that came out of the assessment is that the Arctic states should harmonize Arctic marine shipping regulatory regimes within their own jurisdiction and uniform Arctic safety and environment protection regulations.

The Coast Guard is the main U.S. agency dealing with marine issues, homeland security, environmental protection, science support, border patrol and law enforcement is also preparing for more business in the north. In a report called The emerging Arctic—A new maritime frontier, the Coast Guard concluded that Arctic boundaries must be determined and that all federal, state and local agencies must prepare for full seasonal operations in the Arctic.

The Senate Appropriations Committee approved the Homeland Security Subcommittee's $44.3 billion budget for 2010 and appropriated $32.5 million for a polar icebreaker program. The funding is meant to finish the reactivation of the icebreaker Polar Star and directs the Coast Guard to study whether a new heavy polar icebreaker class is needed or if a major service life extension for existing heavy icebreakers is in order. Currently, the Coast Guard's only working heavy icebreaker, the Polar Sea, has seven years remaining on its service life.

Another concern in the AMSA report deals with the prospect of resource development clashing with traditional subsistence use areas. This is especially pronounced in the Bering Strait area, where the report says, offshore hydrocarbon developments may lead to increased ship traffic. "The Bering Strait region ringed with indigenous communities and a highly productive ecosystem with many species of marine mammals, fish and seabirds, may require formally established vessel routing measures," the report says.

In the process of gathering information for the report, Lawson and Inuit Circumpolar Council director Jimmy Stotts visited Nome last year, as well as Barrow and other coastal communities in Norway, Canada and Iceland. "Some of these inputs from those town hall meetings are the base of the information to write the report," Lawson said last week.

"There are lots of wild cards in the game to paint a picture of the future of the Arctic," Lawson concluded his presentation.

ADF&G curbs Unalakleet River subsistence salmon catches

The Alaska Department of Fish and Game restricted subsistence salmon fishing in the Unalakleet River drainage to set gillnets with mesh size of 6 inches or less from June 29 until further notice.

The subsistence salmon schedule—from 6 p.m. Monday to 6 p.m. Wednesday, and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday—also remains in effect for the Unalakleet River drainage and the marine waters of the Shaktoolik and Unalakleet subdistricts.

“The timing of the in-river mesh-size restrictions coincides with the peak migration period for age 5 and older king salmon into the Unalakleet River,” explains an ADF&G press release issued by the Nome Area Office June 26. “Considering the weak projected run of Unalakleet River king salmon, it is imperative to increase escapements of large and more egg-bound females. Ultimately, allowing more of these more productive females to reach the spawning grounds should mitigate the effects of this year’s projected weak run and improve future returns of king salmon into the drainage.

“The ADF&G Unalakleet River test net has been in operation since June 8 and the North River counting tower, a project operated jointly by Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. and ADF&G, has been in operation since June 19,” states ADF&G. “As of June 25, the Unalakleet River test net has caught 43 king salmon, which is nearly twice the 5-, 10- and 20-year average catches for this date. However, the Unalakleet River test net is not a reliable indicator of king salmon abundance, and the North River counting tower has only enumerated 12 king salmon as of June 25.

“Unalakleet River test net king salmon catches do provide information about king salmon run timing and movements through the drainage,” ADF&G continues. “Typically, king salmon will mill around in the lower Unalakleet River for 5 to 7 days before actively migrating upstream to spawning areas. The first pulse of king salmon detected in the marine subsistence fishery from June 15 to 17 is expected to show up at the tower any day. Further restrictive measures, including an early closure to the king salmon subsistence and sport fisheries, may be necessary if North River king salmon passage and subsistence catch rates are weak. The department will continue to evaluate escapement and catch information in the coming days to determine if further action is necessary or if mesh-size restrictions can be rescinded.”

• Skinny legs

reply by e-mail to the Nugget’s questions asking why and for how long the plant will be closed.

“In order to get the best possible price for the Norton Sound red king crab for local fishermen, we need to continually and reliably present a quality product to our customers in Norton Sound, other parts of Alaska and overseas. This year the meat fill on the crab legs is below what we have seen in previous years. The crab looks beautiful, comes from a healthy population but is skinny. We decided to hold off on purchases until the crab have a chance to gain weight.

“So, why are the crab skinny?” Ferry continued. “After talking to biologists from NSEDC’s Fisheries Research and Development Division and the Alaska Department of Fish and Game, the consensus is that first, a colder than normal spring may have kept the crab’s metabolism depressed, which in turn may have caused them not to gain weight after their molt.

And second, the 2009 season opened two weeks earlier than in previous years. The season previously opened about July first for Community Development Quota crab, closed [and] then reopened for open access crab. During those years in which the season opened later, there had been some CDQ crab with low—not as low as this year—meat fill.

“We expect to see a better meat fill next week and will resume purchasing as soon as a quality product can be produced,” Ferry wrote. “NSSP will sample the crab and monitor their meat fill.” The NSSP plant is owned and operated by Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., one of six entities in the Western Alaska Community Development Program. NSEDC represents 15 Bering Strait communities in the CDQ program.

This summer’s commercial red king crab quota is 375,000 pounds. Of that amount 7.5 percent (28,125 pounds) is allocated to the CDQ fishery. The Norton Sound CDQ and open access fisheries opened simultaneously this year.

Man convicted of sexual assault

A 24-year-old man was convicted of first- and second-degree sexual assault June 22 following a jury trial in Nome.

Moses Milligan was convicted on the two counts which stemmed from an incident that occurred June 26, 2008. He is scheduled to be sentenced in October and faces a sentence of 20 to 30 years.

According to the state Department of Law, Milligan assaulted his girlfriend’s co-worker after a party the co-worker had hosted. After the victim had driven other guests home in the morning, she came home and went to sleep alone in her bed. She awoke to find Milligan on top of her, engaged in intercourse. The Department of Law said Milligan did not immediately stop when asked to withdraw.

After Milligan left the room, the victim immediately called the Nome police. Officers found Milligan outside the victim’s apartment. According to the Department of Law, Milligan first feigned no knowledge of the incident before conceding that there may have been sex but no assault.

At trial, by contrast, Milligan offered the jury a graphic account of consensual sex he said was initiated by the victim. But the jury found Milligan guilty of second-degree sexual assault, for penetrating the victim as she slept, and first-degree sexual assault, for continuing without her consent.

The case was prosecuted by Nome District Attorney John Earthman.

Ladder leads robbers into ANB

The Alaska Native Brotherhood Club reported being broken into in the early morning hours of June 24.

Nome Police Department said it received a report of a burglary at the club located at 605 West 4th Ave. around 8 a.m. June 24. An investigation revealed someone had forced entry into the building earlier in the morning using a ladder. Damage to the building was estimated at more than $250.

According to Chief Dallas Massie, no suspects have been identified at this time. He did say video surveillance from inside the club that captured an image of a suspect is being evaluated.

Massey would not elaborate on what was stolen from the establishment, but noted it was nothing significant.

Whoever forced their way into the club must have been in a hurry to leave since they left their ladder behind. Massey said his department would love to speak with the party who owns the ladder.

An e-mail sent out on a popular local list-serve the day after the break-in from ANB Club and Trust President Joleen Oleson also sought out the ladder’s owner. “We’re willing to trade the ladder you left behind for the key to our safe,” her message reads.

Anyone with information related to the incident is asked to contact police at 443-5262.

School board president turns in resignation

After a dozen years of service, Karmun seeks job within district

By Tyler Rhodes

Nome Board of Education President Gloria Karmun announced her resignation after 12 years of service Tuesday.

The school board scheduled a special meeting for July 1 to act on Karmun's resignation. The meeting was scheduled to occur after press time.

Karmun said she is resigning so she can put her hat in the ring for a job opening up within the district. "That's my main reason for resigning, because I would like to pursue employment with the district," she said. "I can't pass up this opportunity to attempt, or at least apply, for the job."

The school district requires that a board member give up his or her seat in order to apply for a district job. Karmun said she wishes to apply for the district's personnel officer position. The job opened up with Cynthia Gray's recent resignation.

While the results of the July 1 meeting were unavailable as of press time, Karmun said the board in the past has solicited letters of interest from community members wishing to fill an open seat until its term expires. Karmun said normally the board's vice chair, who is currently Albert McComas, would assume the president's seat.

Karmun's seat will be up for election in October. Regardless of her resignation, the seat may have been open to a newcomer this fall anyway.

"I've been struggling whether or not I would run, but I had not made the final decision," she said.

The personnel officer is not the only opening the district is currently looking to fill. In terms of teachers, the district is recruiting for a senior high English/language arts teacher, an elementary physical education teacher and a half-time teacher at the Anvil City Science Academy. The district is also recruiting for two certified early childhood education teachers to work at the Nome Pre-school and Kawerak Head Start programs (see the related story on this page 10 for more). "It's kind of an unusual list at this time of year," said personnel officer Gray said at a June 23 board meeting.

In addition to Gray's position, the district also has noncertified staff openings for an instructional/media aide for the Native program at the high school, and three special education aides.

Board nods at coaches, activities director still on standby

By Tyler Rhodes

After a delay of several weeks, the Nome Board of Education cleared the way June 23 for school district administrators to offer contracts to coaches and advisors. The board opted, however, to continue withholding the contract for the district's activities director position.

The move came two weeks after the board withheld offering all the extra-duty contracts as it discussed a related personnel issue and the development of the district's activities handbook for the next school year.

In its June 23 special meeting, the board considered an initial motion to direct the administration to offer all the extra-duty contracts. Board member Albert McComas then introduced an amendment removing the activities director position from the offering. McComas' motion, which passed 3-2, asked that the activities director contract be subject to approval by the board. The amendment passed with support from McComas, Board President Gloria Karmun and board member Kirsten Timbers. Board members Betsy Brennan and Barb Nickels voted against the amendment, voicing their belief that all the contracts should have been offered.

History teacher Pat Callahan has served as the activities director, as well as the boys basketball head coach, for the past few years.

Once the amendment was approved, the full board voted to allow the rest of the contracts to be offered.

Despite school being out for the summer, the delay in letting the contracts prompted concern and difficulty for some in the community. Speaking as a parent and community member, Mari Lammer pleaded with the board to offer the contracts. "By delaying extra-duty contracts, it has a direct effect on summer plans and athletics," she said.

Lammer, who is also a teacher in the district, told the board that if the contracts were not offered, programs such as cross country and volleyball would be hampered in their startup in the late summer. A more immediate effect was felt by programs like wrestling and girls basketball which participated in summer camps. Lammer said funds for those programs, including those raised by students and parents, were not available while the contracts were outstanding.

"I urge you to resolve your concerns tonight, as it will affect summer travel and fall startup," Lammer said before the board voted.

Lammer also spoke to the value of having an official school coach or an advisor present on trips and at activities, such as a camp. Having the coach of record present, she said, makes it clear to the students that the school rules and regulations will apply during the activity.

Board member Brennan echoed Lammer's sense of urgency. "I think it's very important to offer these contracts," she said. "We should not be holding our students hostage as we have these last few weeks."

Board President Karmun said she did not believe the board's actions were putting extracurricular activities in peril. She noted that the district administration and school board are available in the absence of an activities director. "I don't feel like we're jeopardizing the athletic department," she said. "I feel they can come to the school board for guidance."

Brennan and Nickels, however, were adamant in their opinion that the activities director contract be offered. "I want to express my frustration with not offering all the extra-duty contracts," Brennan said. "The person who is organizing many fall events is not on contract."

Nickels questioned the motivation of singling out the one position. "I would hope as a school board that we are making a decision based on a position and not on personnel," she said.

Nickels brought up the district's policy that contracts valued at less than $10,000 can be offered by the district administration without the approval of the school board. "It's my gut feeling that I would not want to take that away from administration," Nickels said.

The board's vote came during a meeting that was held directly following a work session. The first action taken by the board once the meeting started was to call an executive session, during which it met out of the public view for more than an hour before coming back to the Nome Elementary School library. The executive session was called by board member Timbers to discuss a personnel issue that was also the subject of an executive session at the board's June 9 meeting.

In the work session prior to the official meeting, the board heard from incoming Superintendent Jon Wehde who defended the hiring practice used for selecting a new girls varsity basketball coach. Former coach Dennis Welch will no longer work for the district next year after accepting a position in Homer. Nome-Beltz Vice Principal Doug Boyer was named as Welch's replacement.

Wehde said the hiring committee is normally assembled by the assistant principal, who in this case bowed out since he was a candidate. Wehde said the activities director also petitioned to be excused from the interview team, citing personal prejudices. Wehde said the superintendent stepped in to fill out the committee. "That was an appropriately assembled committee," he told the board.

Wehde noted, however, that the 2009-2010 activities handbook is currently in draft form if there are provisions in regard to hiring that the board does not like. "Keep in mind this is last year's book," he said. "If there are concerns over findings or rules, they are now in draft form."

Board member McComas commented that he was not in favor of the rehiring provisions allowed for coaches. Under the current policy, coaches and advisors are offered the first right of refusal. This means if a coach receives a satisfactory evaluation at the end of the season, he or she will again be the head coach next season unless they opt to no longer accept the position. "I want to get [the hiring process] out where it's open, transparent and fair," McComas said. "Let's post them every year."

McComas proposed a hypothetical situation in which a seasoned coaching veteran in a specific sport comes to the district. McComas said in such a situation, under current rules, a second-year coach who is still learning the ropes but performing satisfactorily could have a stronghold on a program while the proven coach sits on the sidelines. "[The policy] hurts our programs," he said. "These programs, they pull kids in and keep them in school."

Other board members were not so supportive of the idea. "You're walking a slippery slope, there," Brennan said, noting that there could be more reasons for individuals to want a coach removed beyond a more experienced person moving to town or an unsatisfactory review.

Nickels questioned if the same hiring practice was applied to teaching positions in the district.

McComas also lauded changes already implemented in the draft version of the handbook such as the addition of a community member to the hiring committee for advisors and coaches. "I like that," he said. "Any time we can bring a community member in, that's great." The board is scheduled to meet again July 21.

JROTC not giving up

The Nome Board of Education also heard from student members of the Nome Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps at its combined meeting and work session June 23. Cadet Sam Schmidt asked for the board's support as the program works to find funding to keep itself alive.

The program has a steep uphill climb to complete if it is to again be included in the upcoming school year. The school district last funded JROTC in the 2007-2008 school year. The city stepped in last school year to keep the program going. Neither entity stepped up to provide funding that requires nearly $150,000 in salaries for the instructors. The program requires two instructors.

Maj. Gary Grennon, who ran the JROTC program in Nome for years, will no longer be in Nome next year as he has accepted a position as an instructor at Anchorage's East High School.

Schmidt said JROTC has raised approximately $26,000 on its own and is still trying to find ways to find the funds. Cadet Landis Bjorgen also addressed the board, detailing his efforts and travails in calling businesses to seek funding.

Board members acknowledged the good the program does as well as their inability to provide financial support. Outside of granting funds, board members said they would try and offer support in other ways.

Board member Betsy Brennan suggested that district officials keep the program in mind if they learn of funding opportunities. Board member Barb Nickels said she would personally come help at fundraisers or other events JROTC organized to show that the board does support the program.

Nome isn't crazy, that really is a green bike

By Anna Hahn

Nome has seen his bright yellow apparel, heard his foreign engine, stared at his...bike, and some have even ventured to look him in the eye and strike a conversation. Who... or rather what is this guy, and what the heck is he doing in (and out) of town?

Dr. Gregory Frazier is a man who suffers greatly from a disease (commonly known around Germany) as wanderlust. It's an addiction, need, as well as impulse to wander, travel, and explore.

“I remember in the 1970s, there was a poster of a fellow — he had ridden a motorcycle from Alaska to Argentina. That gave me the curiosity,” admitted Frazier.

There is a map beside Frazier's bed, and for more than 10 years he has been looking at Nome and realizing that there are three roads leading out of the town.

The history of the Gold Rush, Wyatt Earp, the Red Light District, and historical population sizes also drew him to the city.

He is currently in Nome touring the roads and will write approximately six articles throughout the next two years, all in reference to Nome and its road systems.

“I have a motorcycle here that is made for a combo of road and off road biking,” said Frazier.

This is approximately the 24th trip the motorcyclist had made to Alaska and first one to Nome.

When he travels he keeps no formal diary or journal, but rather a collection of notes (ex: the price of gas per gallon, the amount of a hotel room, food and drinks). He also confessed that he tends not to write books on the road but rather back home in Denver, Colorado.

The clothes Frazier wears are almost all made by GOR-TEX, down to the gloves. The bright yellow jacket he wears is for protection and to be visible.

“I've been hit by a vehicle four times while riding and all four times the other driver said they didn't see me. With this [jacket] on, it's hard for them to say that,” said Frazier.

Frazier added that while he is here he will take between 2,000 and 3,000 photographs and that he wishes people would stop to talk to him.

“When I look at the trips around the world that I've made, it's not so much the places I remember, but the people that I meet and remember more.”

Nomeites walk to fight cancer

by Nancy McGuire

It was cool and a brisk wind blew in off the Bering Sea but that didn't stop a group of about 40 Nomeites who put on their parkas and walked the East End Loop from the picnic shelter, up the Bypass Road and back Saturday afternoon. They walked to show their support for the battle against cancer.

The walk was part of the Relay for Life to raise funds for the American Cancer Society and the local cancer support group, the Arctic ICANS.

Cancer impacts the lives of many. It touches many friends, family members and individuals in all walks of life. Nomeites had a chance to walk in honor of folks who are currently battling cancer and in memory of those who died from cancer.

When walkers completed the route they were treated to some hot dogs, sandwiches and soft drinks and got a chance to share stories and keep warm. In addition to the walk in town, several Nomeites decided to do the Relay at Salmon Lake. They did not have to battle the wind and the sun was in full glory.

Arctic Icans expresses great thanks to the following organizations/individuals:

- Bering Sea Women's Group
- Nome Grocery
- Camp Department
- Nome Police Department
- Carl Emmons & Velvet Eyes
- Nome Trading Company
- Charlie Lean
- Rahnna Parker

And to all who contributed their time and talent to make the Relay For Life fundraiser a success.

Supreme Court sides with Hageland pilots

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Alaska Supreme Court this month upheld a Superior Court ruling that Hageland Aviation does indeed owe a class of pilots overtime pay, clearing the way for the pilots to collect $1.6 million in back pay and damages.

The 23 former and then-current pilots for the air service, led by former pilot John Harms, brought a class action suit in 2002 for unpaid overtime wages due them according to the Alaska Wage and Hour Act. The pilots generally worked a 14-hour day, court documents said.

Subsequently, two legislative actions sought to support the "vulnerable rural air transport industry" by making the lawsuit go away and chilling future similar suits. These acts went against the Alaska Constitution, the lower court found.

When the Legislature amended the labor law in 2003 to exempt pilots from the act's overtime pay section, Hageland moved to dismiss the 2002 lawsuit.

The Alaska Superior Court Judge Peter Michalski ruled in 2004 that the change exempting airlines from paying the pilots overtime could apply only from the effective date of July 16, 2003. Legislative action then amended the law in 2005 to make the 2003 change retroactive to 2000. Hageland again filed to be excused from paying the overtime. At the same time, the pilots argued that the retroactive exemption in a number of ways went against the state and federal constitutions. The Superior Court again went with the pilots.

Michalski declared the legislative action making the exemption retroactive to 2000 violated a "takings" and "contract" clause of the Alaska Constitution, and violated the federal constitution.

The Superior Court reasoned that Hageland's practice of docking pilots' pay for partial day absences violated state labor department rules against salaries of employees not paid overtime being reduced because of varying work loads, therefore the pilots were the class of non-exempt employees that get overtime pay for extra hours.

The Superior Court said the legislative actions caused a financial loss to the pilots. Additionally, it said the legislation impaired the contractual relationship between the pilots and Hageland. It also went against the state constitution that forbids private property being taken for public use (supporting the fragile air transport industry) without just compensation. In 2007 the parties agreed on damages of $1.6 million and a final judgment was entered.

Hageland and executives Michael Hageland and James Tweto appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that there was no loss to the pilots—that they had not expected overtime and did not rely on it. Hageland further argued that the contract that was affected—the payment of overtime according to state law—was not infringed. On June 5, the high court upheld Michalski's ruling.

In supporting the legislation—HB 171 and SB 105—applying the overtime compensation exemption to flight crews, committee meeting minutes cite several air commuter executives saying in March 2005 they paid flight crews fair wages and that paying straight time prevented pilots from pushing weather and safety considerations to get overtime pay. Bruce McGlasson, at the time president and owner of Grant Aviation, said his company paying a daily rate encouraged safety because on a daily rate, pilots were paid whether they flew or not. Paying an hourly rate gave pilots an incentive to fly when they should not fly. Several pilots, including Brett Harris of Hageland Aviation, said the daily lump pay rate was fair and encouraged safety. Bob Hadjukovich of Frontier Aviation, in supporting SB 105, told legislators that pilots in Alaska are compensated very well compared to those flying in other parts of the country, so the lawsuits against Hageland surprised him.

Another Hageland pilot, Jason Wilson, told legislators that pilots flying Cessna 207s made $90 per flying hour and that some pilots for Hageland made as much as $150 per flight hour. In 2004, there were very few days when pilots exceeded 10 hours of flight time, Wilson said, and he and many other pilots did not feel a need to be paid overtime.

Two grants to fund three new school jobs

By Tyler Rhodes

The school district has received a grant funding two teachers who will work with students before they ever pass through the doors of the elementary school.

Under the Alaska Pilot Pre-Kindergarten Program, Nome Public Schools will receive $219,539 to provide and support the program at the Nome Preschool and Kawerak Head Start during the next school year. The grant is renewable for the 2010-2011 school year.

According to district business manager Jenny Martens, the funding will cover the salaries of the two certified early childhood education teachers, student transportation, supplies and professional development for the two teachers. "It's well-rounded and covers all the aspects of doing this program," Martens said.

The program has the teachers working with the students on a 10-1 ratio.

Martens told the Nome Board of Education at its June 23 work session that the collaboration between the Nome Preschool and Head Start programs helped the district score high in the competitive grant process.

While the two teachers will be working in buildings outside of the district, they will considered Nome Public Schools employees. Despite that fact, the children with whom the new teachers will work will not be counted toward the district's enrollment, an important factor in the amount of state funding it receives.

The district has also received a $49,000 grant to hire a new employee and host a mentoring program. The funding from the Alaska Staff Development Network previously went to the Big Brother Big Sister program. While the organization receiving the funds has changed, the mission of the program has not. The new hire will work to match children in the fourth through eighth grades with an adult who can act as a mentor and friend to the student.

"It's a completely wonderful opportunity," Superintendent Jon Wehde told the Nome Board of Education at the work session. "This came at a point where I can only take it as a blessing and windfall."

The funds will apply to the 2009-2010 school year.

Decision on Unalakleet baby starvation death due

By Sandra L. Medearis
The Alaska Supreme Court staff have reported an appeal involving a baby starved to death in 2003 “ripe for a decision” on whether the lower courts properly denied the father an acquittal in response to earlier appeals.
Heather Takak and Frank R. Johnson in separate trials were found guilty of starving Christina N. Johnson until she died at a Unalakleet clinic on Nov. 17, 2003.
A grand jury indicted Takak on the first-degree murder charge at the end of May 2004, and indicted the baby’s father, Frank R. Johnson, on second-degree murder. In a trial held in Unalakleet, a jury found Johnson guilty of manslaughter. Johnson filed for acquittal, saying the state did not prove its case in that the jury attributed the death to the wrong cause. Nome court judge Ben Esch denied Johnson an acquittal, but said he could have a new trial.

Takak worked out a plea deal that dropped the charge from murder to manslaughter. She drew a sentence of 20 years in August 2006 and went to Hiland Correctional for manslaughter after her daughter died in a state of starvation and with fresh head injuries from her mother throwing her on the floor. At issue in Johnson’s verdict was whether the baby died from the injuries or from starvation.
The state Court of Appeals accepted Johnson’s trial and verdict for review, but it ruled against Johnson and Esch, ruling out a new trial and ordering Johnson to be sentenced on the verdict of manslaughter.

Johnson then appealed to the Alaska Superior Court. Court documents show that on June 10 all briefs have been filed and oral arguments presented in Johnson’s appeal.
Pending the outcome of his case, Johnson lived in third party custody situations and at the Seaside Center where he held a job in town. However, in early 2008 in a separate case, Johnson was found in violation of release conditions and jailed.
The prosecutor in the cases, Rick Svobodny, said Takak had earned the full sentence—20 years— for manslaughter because of aggravating factors—the baby was less than a year old and extremely vulnerable because she could not escape or ask for help, and the additional factor that Takak and the victim belonged to the same social unit living under the same roof. Another child in the home, a five-year-old son, received nutrition and care.

“It is just inexplicable, why Ms. Takak is taking care of one child and not another, and why in a fit of anger she throws a baby to the ground because she is mad at the person she lives with,” Svobodny said.
Takak and Johnson took Christina N. Johnson to the Unalakleet clinic early on Nov. 17, 2003 because, they said, she had trouble breathing. The baby died at the clinic, weighing 7.67 pounds, according to late state Chief Medical Examiner Franc Fallico. In July 2005 at the father’s trial, village health aides testified that in the clinic that morning, Christina looked like a three-month-old child.

An autopsy found evidence from the baby’s remains that she had starved and had injuries to her head within several days of her death.
In a statement to an investigating Alaska State Trooper, Takak said she had not fed Christina and had dropped her twice intentionally in the bedroom of the couple’s Unalakleet home.
“I dropped her on purpose. I was in the bedroom. I dropped her twice,” Takak said according to a trooper statement admitted to the court record.
Throughout the case, Svobodny argued Johnson had neglected the welfare of his daughter and should have foreseen that Takak would harm the baby.

David J. Katongan Sr.

David J. Katongan Sr. was born February 5, 1936 to Hannah and Pete Katongan at Unalakleet and died suddenly at his home May 16, 2009. He is survived by his loving wife Mildred of 48 years to whom he married May 23, 1960 by Rev. Maynard Londborg at the Unalakleet Covenant Church. He is survived by his children Loretta, David Jr.,

David completed school to the eighth grade, choosing to stay at home to help his parents hunt, fish and trap when high school students would leave home and not return until after graduation. David had a passion for dogs, which was a result of the responsibility he took to take care of his Dad’s dog team. As a teenager he raised his own team of dogs as long distance runners. All his life Across the River was his home away from home.

On October 28, 1957 he joined the Army National Guard and attended basic training at Fort Ord, CA. He was honorably discharged as Sergeant.

David retired from the Alaska Commercial Company where he worked as butcher and transferred from Nome back to his hometown of Unalakleet in July 1979, continuing to work for the AC Company before retirement. David’s wife Millie remembers how he encouraged harmony and wanted to see that everyone in his family was healthy and strong. The apple of his eye was his great grandson Chase, and he would ask him every morning, “what are your eyes going to see today?”

We will always cherish good times and his life with us will always be precious memories.

Palin calls it quits with more than a year to go

By Diana Haecker

In a startling announcement last Friday, Gov. Sarah Palin told a few reporters at her home in Wasilla that she is not seeking re-election in the 2010 gubernatorial race and that she will quit before her term is up.

Palin gave notice that on July 26, after the Governor's picnic in Fairbanks, the transfer of power takes place with a swearing-in ceremony of current Lt. Gov. Sean Parnell. Replacing Parnell as Lt. Governor will be Commissioner of the Department of Military and Veterans Affairs Lt. Major Craig Campbell.

Palin's announcement came as a complete surprise to Alaskans, pundits and the nation.

A spokeswoman sent out press releases Friday morning, inviting the press to attend an "announcement" to be made at the Palin's home at Lake Lucille. After the hastily called press conference—much of the press including The Associated Press didn't make it in time—Palin posted a Facebook announcement at noon: "Update from Governor Palin: We'll soon attach info on decision to not seek re-election... this is in Alaska's best interest, my family's happy... it is good, stay tuned."

During the actual announcement, Palin did not provide concrete reasons for stepping down. While official press releases issued by the governor's press office are cryptic, Palin posted

Adventurers ply the sea with a purpose

Sailors, scientists and teachers aim to circle the Americas while promoting ocean awareness

By Tyler Rhodes

With contributions from Nome Nugget intern Anna Hahn

At either end of the summer each passing year, Nome sees a growing number of ships sailing through its harbor either on their way north to attempt the Northwest Passage or voyaging south after successfully making it.

For most of these sailors, the purpose of the voyage is adventure. For the crew of the Ocean

Watch, who were scheduled to sail north out of Nome Tuesday after a stay of nearly a week, they would like to say theirs is an adventure full of purpose.

Three years in the planning, the voyage is part scientific research expedition and part PR campaign aimed at raising awareness of the threats faced by the oceans. As important as the scientific and educational components are, with a plan to circumnavigate North and South America by sailing through the Northwest Passage and around Cape Horn, the Ocean Watch is also more than likely to see its fair share of adventure. "We're trying to raise awareness about some important ocean health issues by circumnavigating North and South America, and treating them as one island surrounded by one ocean and one ecosystem," said Mark Schrader, the skipper of the 64-foot sailboat.

The Ocean Watch and its crew motored into Nome on a rare glassy Bering Sea in the late hours of June 30. The voyage originated a month earlier in Seattle and made stops in Victoria and Alert Bay in British Columbia, and Juneau and Dutch Harbor in Alaska before porting in Nome.

The crew of the sailing vessel represents well the diverse goals of the trip. Captain and project director Schrader is an accomplished seaman who

Credit union burglars bungle the job

Would-be thieves damage Credit Union 1's office but leave empty-handed

By Sandra L. Medearis

A member of Credit Union 1 rushing in 10 minutes after opening Monday to cover an overdraft instead found the staff sitting in the hall, telling customers the office would remain dark and locked pending a police investigation.

Robbed! But because no weapons appeared to be used to take money from tellers, one would more accurately term the weekend sneak-in as "Burglarized!"

Asaalu Ireland, employee, said she got a phone call at home with the message that the place had been robbed and would not open at the usual 9:30 a.m.

Meanwhile, Shirley Okbaok stood in the hall holding a cash deposit bag and called Louie's Cab to cancel her return to Teller. Gary Hart was also left holding his bag. Both made their deposits later in the day.

"I came all the way down here to deposit this cash, and now I don't

Letters

Dear Editor, Council Members, Madame City Manager, and Public Works Director,

PLEASE DON'T LET OUR WELLS BECOME UNUSABLE BECAUSE OF CONTAMINATION.

How should we live in Nome? We all are often incompetent to solve the problems of our times. It is difficult to span the huge orbits of all that is going on in the City. Please do what is right in reference to the Moonlight Springs Watershed contamination. Don't perceive that you have limitations. As City Council members your powers are unlimited. Are Mr. Marvin Rapose and others without permits and in violation of those permits being allowed to continue?

Don't our officials and council need to be fired up with the hope of reforming these violations? You may not be able to restore these violators to normal, as they are set in their ways. They "willfully" dump petroleum products, they have neither emotional ties or sense of duty and responsibility to our sole source of drinking water nor respect for our laws. It is an honor and privilege and not a god-given right to have a permit. What Rapose did should not be accepted. For every single reason for acceptance there are 10 reasons for denial of permits to these rough, cowboy-like, unethical and illegal happenings. Leaders of our city should perceived this as a terror attack on everyone's watershed. City leaders need to face what has happened and will continue to happen. What they have done was not out of love or peace but a hateful, warlike, terrorist attack on our only drinking water source that costs the city almost nothing compared to the fixed and variable expenditures in our budget. The Rapose operation is a disgrace but is concealed by distance of miles. The city found and uncovered the problem. There are many legal remedies. The City of Nome could condemn the land; stop the permit, and let the District Attorney bring criminal action including penalties; order the clean up of the site, and many more actions. That operation without a permit should receive the $300 daily penalty for not having one, a cease and desist order and wait the required 45 days for the city to review the permit application. Weekly monitoring at the site or at our wells could be mandated, at the permittees' expense. Respectfully, Dr. Derrick Leedy Nome, Alaska.

Dear Editor, I am concerned about the state of affairs of today and would like to find out how we can reduce the size of the unemployment numbers. I have some suggestions where independent businesses would take some of the functions of the city or the state, i.e., accounting, inspection of buildings or hiring personnel. In our review of the expenses listed in the government budget, our small businesses do not have the large overhead, as it would bankrupt our businesses. If the departments in our city, county or state would allow citizen businesses to outsource an overspending department this would help the citizens' taxes to go further for better efficiency. How do you feel about the government owning a building that is for athletes only when we have hundreds of people on unemployment? There are many wealthy individuals that would be able to own that facility, and the city would no longer be paying for it. There would be no need for a joint venture with the city holding all the maintenance and building expenses. That would be the responsibility of the private owner having their own private joint venture. This would eventually reduce the amount of the taxes and unemployment fees. The private owner would then hire the unemployed worker. My idea is to open up the bidding procedure with simple procedures for the small business owner. The bids would then allow more small businesses to step up for the new outsourcing procedure. This will allow many departments of the government that are being unfunded by the Stimulus Package to function in the free enterprise system. You will then have an opportunity to invite entrepreneurs who have never worked for the government to do the job for you. Why not have fewer regulations involved in the inclusion of small businesses in the bidding system? Please contact me at warrensrock@starband.net. Warren S. Lame Excuses

What's with governors these days? Spitzer, Blagojevitch, Sanford—hanky-panky, bribery, more hanky-panky. New York, Illinois, South Carolina and now Alaska's governor, dear Sarah Palin says she loves Alaska too much to be governor. Is there something in the water? Palin says she doesn't want to be a lame duck. Well, hit us with a box of quackers, lame duck yer Aunt Fannie. Give us a break! That's such a lame excuse. Come on Sarah, what's the real reason? Did the right wing suddenly flap around and whack her on the noggin? She must have been planning this move for a while to time her announcement at the start of the 4th of July holidays. What's this for the love of Alaska schmaltz? When's the other shoe going to drop? Is she thinking of a role in national politics? Is she going to seek national office? The Republicans aren't that stupid, are they? Maybe Sarah just doesn't like Juneau. Do we need to build a new executive mansion? She is all worked up over reported rumors about her house in Wasilla. What's the reason for a sitting governor to resign? She should tell us the real truth. Nothing makes sense, but what the heck, Alaska will be better off. Does anyone know anything about this fellow Parnell? So long Sarah. Don't let the door hit you on the way out. —N.L.M.—

FEMA, state to pay out disaster relief funds

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has approved the State of Alaska's request for additional communities to receive disaster relief funds for the spring flooding that devastated villages along the Yukon and Kuskokwim rivers. The original federal disaster declaration did not include programs that offer individual assistance for several communities because the flood was still ongoing at the time of the federal disaster declaration on June 11.

Federal individual assistance pays a maximum of $30,300 per affected household and State of Alaska individual assistance pays $5,000 per affected household. Members of the Alaska Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Management and FEMA were in Bethel and the surrounding villages last week to help flood victims to get the necessary paperwork done for funding assistance.

Regions and communities added to the federal disaster declaration and about to receive individual assistance are the Lower Yukon Regional Education Attendance Area including Emmonak, Russian Mission, Kotlik, and Alakanuk; the Yupiit REAA including Akiak, Akiachak and Tuluk-sak. The Lower Yukon REAA was added for public assistance, including Emmonak, Russian Mission, Kotlik and Alakanuk, and the Yukon-Koyukuk REAA including Tanana was approved for public assistance. The area was already approved for individual assistance. The Alaska Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Management also announced last week that individuals and families could register for state disaster assistance from the 2009 spring floods. The Bering Strait REAA is one of the areas where state individual and family grants and temporary housing programs are available. Other regions are the Lower Kuskokwim, Iditarod and Copper River as well as the Matanuska-Susitna Borough and the Northwest Arctic Borough. The program is meant for residents who sustained damages to their primary residence, personal property or transportation during the spring 2009 flooding. The deadline to apply is September 3.

Parental consent to abortion initiative certified

Lieutenant Governor Sean Parnell last week gave the green light on an initiative that would require parental notice or consent before a minor under 18 years old could have an abortion. The initiative exempts cases of sexual abuse by a parent or guardian, but the teen is required to submit a notarized statement, unless she convinces a court to bypass notice, or in the clinical judgment of the doctor, there is a medical emergency.

Parnell's certification now allows the initiative to collect the required 32,734 signatures to place the measure on the ballot. Former Lt. Governor Loren Leman sponsored the initiative. In connection with the proposed measure, the Associated Press reports that Bev Wooley, a high-level Public Health Division director, left the Alaska Department of Health and Social Services last week. AP reported that her departure may be connected to Gov. Sarah Palin's anti-abortion views, as Palin backs the initiative.

Wooley and another public health official, Dr. Jay Butler left the state department last month. Butler told the Juneau Empire he suspects Wooley's departure may have been related to conflicts between Palin's anti-abortion views and state health staff's reluctance to present medical information they believed was inaccurate about a bill requiring parental consent for abortion.

A similar bill in the legislature passed the House, but stalled in a Senate committee when its language was amended from parental consent to parental notification. Lawmakers questioned the bill because Department of Health and Social Services staff did not appear to testify in its favor.

Two unrelated Alaska Railroad accidents claim one life, smash a truck

On July 4, a 42-year old Anchorage man was hit and killed by a southbound Alaska railroad passenger train as he tried to get his dog off the tracks. Brett Miller was hit by the train near Montana Creek. KTNA radio reports that train workers saw him in the attempt to retrieve his dog. The train crew blew the whistle and went into emergency braking, but was unable to stop in time. The man was struck and thrown of the track. Miller and the dog died at the scene.

The next day, another southbound passenger train hit a pickup truck near Eklutna. A 16-year old male driver and his two passengers had driven the truck on the tracks and got stuck when they tried to turn the car around. As the train approached they got out of the car in time. The train crew spotted the vehicle, hit the emergency brakes but couldn't get the train to stop before slamming into the pickup. The train carried nearly 700 passengers and eventually continued on towards its final destination of Anchorage. The train did not derail and no injuries were reported.

Wild fires burn in Denali National Park

The season of the red sun is upon the interior as haze from several wildfires are burning in and near Denali National Park and Preserve. A slight northwind pushed smoke and fire into the park last week. The biggest fire is located along Bear Creek, north of Kantishna, covering 23,591 acres. The National Park Service reports that Alaska Fire Service smokejumpers were flown in on Saturday to provide structural protection to the Roosevelt Cabin, a historic cabin located roughly three miles from the southern end of the

City earns an A+ for good bookkeeping

By Anna Hahn

From Anvil City's birth there have been books to record the mining claims, City lines, private property, deeds, etc. When Anvil City became Nome, those books were still around and probably documented the event. Now those manuscripts are held in the town's original recorder's office with supervision, as well as ongoing care and attention, from the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum.

In the 1990s, the City Council was being threatened by the State of Alaska, which was going to take the Recorder's Office out of Nome and put it in Fairbanks.

The office closed between 2003 and 2004, and when it did the technology that allowed the books to be scanned and recorded onto CDs was available. They currently hold those (along with the original books) in one of their storage units. They also keep all of the materials available for public access.

"They took all the books out of Nome for a period of several months and scanned every single page. They had to get all the pages out, so as a result they had to break the bindings of each book. That's why all the books are currently tied together with cotton. This entire project was a tremendous task to accomplish," stated Laura Samuelson, the director of the City's museum.

In an effort to maintain the historical value of Nome's first recorder's book (from October 15, 1898), the museum paid a woman in Anchorage a little over $700 to have the book's spine re-sewn together by hand. This task took approximately six months.

Currently, in order for the town to keep the books in Nome, the State sends their archivist up to inspect the books every five years.

"I come around and make sure the books are being maintained properly and that they're good for another five year period. I come up and look at the records, that they're being monitored for temperature and humidity control properly, and I also look at the charts and the fluctuation of temperature and humidity," said Glen Cook. "I also looked at the book paper. I make sure it's not getting too brittle too quick from having too little humidity in the air. Everything here is fine, so we're going ahead and for the next five years, approving the books to stay in Nome. We won't worry about them until that time. We'll come back and do another review of them, hopefully extend out that five years indefinitely."

According to Cook (and conservators for the State), Nome is doing a good job of preserving their materials, in reference to temper and humidity control and even when it comes to displaying their possessions.

"We have to follow stringent standards to maintain these books and keep them. That's also how we take care of the rest of our collection as well—all our artifacts and other archive books we have," said Samuelson.

To continue with their own high standards of care, the museum keeps their record books in a single room with no light nor windows, and in a stable environment with little fluctuation in humidity or temperature.

NEW NUMBERS—Fuel prices dropped with delivery of new, cheaper oil arriving on fuel barges.

Fuel prices show a modest savings

By Sandra L. Medearis

Comparison shoppers cruising the town found a drop in heating fuel prices Monday, resulting from new cheaper oil coming across the Port of Nome.

So far, Crowley Maritime has the best deal based on sampling prices for small orders, 100 gallons, and larger deliveries, 300 gallons. Monday's price check revealed the following: Crowley, $4.47 a gallon for 300-gallon deliveries, $4.53 a gallon for 100-gallon deliveries; Bonanza Fuel, Inc., $4.64 and $4.68; West Refueling Service, $4.68 and $4.72. The prices quoted do not include the City of Nome 5 percent sales tax.

On Monday, Bonanza was getting $4.799 a gallon for gasoline while Crowley's price was $4.80 a gallon. Jim West Jr. said he was still penciling on his gas price and had not set it. Prices reflected somewhat how much of last season's expensive oil remained in tanks. Crowley's tanks were way down, allowing more of this season's cheaper oil to flow into them. Bonanza was still factoring in the cost of expensive fuel brought in for the Rock Creek Mine last year but not sold to Alaska Gold when the mine shut down last fall.

West said he hoped that cheaper oil off the fall barge would allow him to lower his price later.

fire. One of the other large fires burning in the area is the Zitiziana Fire, located north of Wein Lake, outside the park boundary. The fire already has claimed 8,800 acres. Smokejumpers were also dropped there to assess if structures are at risk. The fires were started by lightning in mid-June.

Legislator proposes cross-border gas line council

Senate Energy chairwoman Lesil McGuire is about to become the Pacific Northwest Economic Region's president in a summit scheduled for July 12-19 in Boise, Idaho, and one of the first things she'd do is promote the Alaska gas pipeline. McGuire announced that she would jump start a Northern Pipeline Coordinating Council to act as a clearinghouse for gas line issues. McGuire said she neither pushes for the Exxon-TransCanada gasline project nor the Denali Alaska Gas pipeline proposed by ConocoPhillips and BP. The purpose of the Northern Pipeline Coordinating Council would be to resolve cross-border route disagreements and to deal with work force and supply issues that slow down the potential construction of the gas pipeline. She said the council is meant to identify resources and to reduce red tape. The PNWER summit also is scheduled uled to address solar and wind power, geothermal energy, clean car technology and other renewable energy sources. PNWER is a forum for lawmakers from Alaska, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, and the Canadian provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Yukon Territory.

know when I can do it," she said. "I had arrangements with Louie to go back at 10:00."

Officer Mark Harreus of the Nome Police Department arrived shortly after opening time to begin to investigate, followed by Chief Dallas Massie. Police said a call Monday morning said there had possibly been a break-in. Sure enough, police said, someone had forced an entry through a back window off the rear courtyard of the Old Federal Building and tried to break into the safe. Bottom line, the burglar damaged the safe, but did not get it open and crept away empty-handed, according to NPD. They say the attempt to take out a zero-interest "loan" occurred somewhere between the morning of the Fourth of July and Monday morning.

So far, no one has set a dollar amount on damage to the safe and window. Police ask that anyone with information on the crime call NPD at 907-443-5262 while investigation continues.

Polaris Hotel latest to see attempted robbery

By Tyler Rhodes

Joining the ranks of the Alaska Native Brotherhood Club and Credit Union 1, the Polaris Hotel saw a robbery attempt Tuesday morning.

According to Nome Police Chief Dallas Massie, a man jumped over the half-door that separates the hotel's front office and the hallway. "He was rooting around. Nothing was taken. Nothing was disturbed. Nobody was assaulted," Massie said.

The suspect, however, did leave behind a calling card. The proprietor of the hotel caught the suspect in the act, holding him by his hooded sweatshirt as the man struggled to get away. The victim was able to flee, but did so barefoot, leaving his sandals and sweatshirt behind.

Massie said as of Tuesday morning that the suspect was still at large, but he felt confident that he would soon be caught thanks to surveillance footage from the hotel's security system. "They have a very good security system," Massie said. "I think we'll be able to get an identification off the security footage."

School board on the lookout for a new member

By Tyler Rhodes

Within a minute of the start of a special school board meeting July 1, Gloria Karmun walked out of the room no longer a member of the board on which she served—and largely led—for a dozen years.

In that first minute, the four remaining board members briefly read over Karmun's short resignation letter before voting to accept the long-time member's departure during the special meeting held at the Sitisuak Building. Karmun gave up her seat on the Nome Board of Education to apply for the district's personnel officer position, which has opened up with the resignation of Cynthia Gray.

School district policy requires that a board member resign if they are to seek employment within the district.

The remainder of the July 1 meeting was spent mapping out how the board would reorganize its leadership and fill Karmun's seat which will be up for election in October.

The board largely adopted the process that was used the last time a seat was vacated before its term ran out. That process involves inviting members of the public who would like to serve out Karmun's term to write a letter of interest to the board. Candidates must live within the City of Nome to be qualified for the seat. The letters of interest are due to the district office July 15 by 4 p.m.

The vetting of the candidates will occur at a public meeting July 21. All the potential members will be asked a set of questions on which they will be scored by the board members. The questioning will be held in the open with each candidate taking turns at being the first to answer a question in the series. At the end of questioning, the board members' scores will be taken and tallied to determine who will assume the seat.

In their discussion of how best to determine whether or not a candidate is fit to serve, the board debated over whether the current set of questions is adequate to allow a full picture of the potential member's experience. Board members debated on whether they should ask for resumes to accompany the letters of interest. Jenny Martens, who is the district's business manager but was commenting as a citizen, noted that the process of filling an empty board seat is not the same as conducting a job interview.

Board member Albert McComas, who will now act as the board's chairman in the absence of Karmun, agreed with Martens. "No matter what they've done with education in the past, what I really want to know is how well they are going to work with this board in this district," he said.

The board ultimately agreed to not ask for resumes.

The board also discussed its leadership with the departure of Karmun, who served as board president. It was decided that McComas, who is vice chair, will lead the board until October when reorganization would normally occur following the election.

The board initially started its reorganization at the July 1 meeting, displaying a split over who should assume the president's seat. The board got as far as nominations and a vote for the position before scuttling the process until October. Before deciding to delay the reorganization, board member Kirsten Timbers nominated McComas and board member Betsy Brennan nominated Barb Nickels to serve as president. In an open vote, Timbers and McComas voted for McComas, while Brennan and Nickels raised their hands for Nickels. Such a stalemate should be avoided come October when a fifth member of the board will be present.

In their closing comments, board members recognized both Karmun and Gray for their work and service to the district over the years. Members also voiced their hope to see healthy interest in the open seat.

Those interested in applying can contact the district office at 443-2231 for more information.

lengthy commentary on her decision on social Internet networks Facebook and Twitter. In the official press release, Palin said, "I am determined to take the right path for Alaska even though it is not the easiest path." She said that once she decided not to run for re-election, she felt "that to embrace the conventional 'lame duck' status in this particular climate would just be another dose of 'politics as usual,' something I campaigned against and will always oppose." She did not reveal her future plans but said, "I look forward to helping others—to fight for our state and our country, and campaign for those who believe in smaller government, free enterprise, strong national security, support for our troops, and energy independence."

Gov. Palin's press secretary Sharon Leighow confirmed that the two Facebook postings are indeed penned by Sarah Palin.

In these posts, Palin was more explicit than through the official channels and said that the decision has been in the making for quite a while. She wrote that she had consulted for months with her family, friends and Parnell on "what's best for our wonderful state."

"I even made a few administrative changes over that course in time in preparation for yesterday," she wrote. Leighow, asked what those changes were, declined to comment.

Palin wrote that once she decided to not run for re-election, "...my decision was that much easier—I've never been one to waste time or resources."

A flurry of ethics complaints lodged against her caused her legal bills to run up to $500,000, and the state's personnel board spent millions of state funds to investigate various complaints. Fifteen complaints were dismissed, two are still pending a decision and on Monday, a Wasilla man filed another complaint, alleging that Palin continues to collect per diem from the State of Alaska for living in her own home.

Palin also expressed frustration with the political establishment and the media. "How sad that Washington and the media will never understand; it's about country." Then she added a line that is widely interpreted as setting the stage for higher aspirations on the political scene. "And though it's honorable for countless others to leave their positions for a higher calling and without finishing a term, of course we know by now, for some reason a different standard applies for the decisions I make," Palin wrote.

Drawing on a sports analogy, she explained that a good point guard drives through a full court press and passes the ball on for the team to win. "And I'm doing that—keeping our eye on the ball that represents sound priorities—smaller government, energy independence, national security, freedom! And I know when it's time to pass the ball—for victory."

Pundits also questioned the timing of the announcement on Friday, July 3, as Alaska and the nation prepared for Fourth of July celebrations. Palin addressed this aspect as well, saying, "Let's just say, this decision has been in the works for awhile. ... In fact, this decision comes after much consideration, and finally polling the most important people in my life—my children (where the count was unanimous) ... well, in response to asking: 'Want me to make a positive difference and fight for ALL our children's future from OUTSIDE the Governor's office?' It was four 'yes's' and one 'hell yeah!' The 'hell yeah' sealed it—and someday I'll talk about the details of that."

Reactions

Soon-to-be Gov. Sean Parnell said in a prepared statement that his heart is heavy to hear Palin quit. Parnell spoke about her sacrificial service and the selflessness of her decision. "I profoundly respect your decision for I know the depth of character and integrity from which it springs. Rare, indeed, are such selfless acts seen in the public arena," Parnell said.

Parnell outlined his immediate plans to keep all commissioners in office and to work on a seamless and stable transition of power. "Alaskans can expect me to focus on positioning Alaska for economic growth by creating legacy opportunities for our people and future generations," he announced. He cited the gas line as his top priority and pledged support for responsible resource development and energy development of "all kinds for Alaskans."

Reactions to Palin's announcement also included a strong statement from U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski, saying, "I am deeply disappointed that the governor has decided to abandon the state and her constituents before her term has concluded."

Junior U.S. Sen. Mark Begich mostly expressed his consternation. "I'm as surprised as all Alaskans by Governor Palin's decision to step down with nearly two years left in her term," Begich said. "There was speculation she would not seek re-election, but she gave no indication of a resignation when I met with her for 45 minutes in her Anchorage office two days ago."

U.S. Rep. Don Young told The Nome Nugget, "I'm as surprised as anyone by this announcement, but I support her decision and wish her well."

Alaska's Senate President Gary Stevens (R-Kodiak) thanked Palin for her service and said, "She has been a historic and inspirational leader for our state, and we wish her success in all her future endeavors." While his statement about Palin's resignation was short, he said that he is looking forward to working with governor-designee Parnell. "I am enthusiastic about getting down to business with him and mapping out the priorities for the next legislative session," Stevens said. Stevens said that he and other members of the Senate leadership team have scheduled meetings with Parnell after he takes office.

Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. rehires Rieger

By Laurie McNicholas

The Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. has decided to contract with Steve Rieger to manage marketable investment securities that UBS Financial Services has managed for the corporation since early in 2007, according to reliable information sources. The board reportedly made the decision at a special meeting June 23 in Anchorage. Dan Harrelson of White Mountain, NSEDC's president and board chairman, has not responded to an email from The Nome Nugget requesting his comments on reasons for the action.

At an NSEDC board meeting in January of this year, Harrelson reported "atrocious" losses in the company's portfolio of publicly traded securities in 2008. The exact amount of the losses should appear in the company's 2008 annual report, which is due to arrive at post office boxes by the end of this month in NSEDC's 15 member communities throughout the Bering Strait region.

During the January board meeting, Harrelson defended the percent reduction in NSEDC's security portfolio as comparable to that of the Alaska Permanent Fund in 2008. "Look at the national economy and 401(k)s and our losses are consistent," Harrelson said. However, Jack Carpenter, at-large member of NSEDC's finance committee expressed dissatisfaction with the performance of UBS.

"At the November meeting I said UBS did not seem to prepare our investments for the recession," he noted. Carpenter suggested checking the performances of the company's investment managers against guidelines the board had given them. Charles Schwab and Co. also manages a portion of NSEDC's investment portfolio. Henry Ivanoff, at-large finance committee member and former NSEDC board chairman, said the board needs to look at changing the allocation of securities among the investment managers.

Rieger managed NSEDC's former investment management subsidiary, Norton Sound Investment Corp., from 2002 to July 2006 under a contractual agreement. NSEDC's net assets nearly doubled during that period, increasing from $50.3 million at the end of 2002, NSIC's first full year of operation, to $100 million by June 30, 2006.

NSEDC is one of six entities in the Western Alaska Community Development Quota Program authorized under the federal Magnuson-Stevens Act. The CDQ program receives a 10 percent allocation of the annual total allowable catch of Bering Sea pollock, along with allocations of other fish and crab species in the Bering Sea/Aleutian Islands area.

Rieger named Permanent Fund trustee

NSEDC's decision to rehire Rieger came just eight days after Gov. Sarah Palin appointed him to the Alaska Permanent Fund Corporation Board of Trustees.

"It is a pleasure to have a man with Steve Rieger's broad experience, impressive credentials and statesmanlike temperament as the newest Permanent Fund trustee," said Palin. "I have every confidence that Steve's addition to the board will help continue its strong record of prudent management of Alaska's most important financial institution."

The six-member board is responsible for overseeing corporate operations and setting investment policy for the Permanent Fund, established by state constitutional amendment in 1976 to save a portion of state mineral revenue. The fund's investments, currently valued at about $31 billion, generate annual dividends for qualified Alaskans.

Rieger represented south Anchorage in the Alaska Legislature from 1985 to 1995, serving three terms in the House of Representatives and one in the Senate. In earlier years as a legislative staff member, Rieger helped develop legislation establishing the Alaska Permanent Fund Corporation and worked with Wall Street firms on its investment guidelines and governance, according to a state press release announcing his appointment as a trustee.

Clark Gruening, who formerly served in the Alaska Legislature and as a Permanent Fund Corporation trustee, told Juneau Empire reporter Pat Forgey that Rieger had worked to protect the fund's principal by adding in money to offset the effects of inflation. "He's credited with inflation proofing it later, and that has made a great difference in the size and success of the fund," Gruening added (Juneau Empire, June 16, 2009 ed.)

Rieger, who grew up in Palmer, earned a bachelor's degree in economics from Harvard University and a master's degree in business administration from the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration. He operates his own management and consulting firm in Anchorage.

NSEDC's decision surprising

The NSEDC board's recent decision to rehire Rieger to help manage the company's securities investments surprised observers who recall that three years ago the board abruptly terminated his contract with the corporation and dissolved Norton Sound Investment Corp. The board made both decisions immediately after a 13-minute executive session that was called for an unstated reason during a quarterly board meeting July 28, 2006 in Nome. The executive session was closed to the public.

According to minutes of the meeting, the board approved a motion by Don Stiles of Nome, seconded by Paul Johnson of Unalakleet, to direct the NSIC management committee to terminate the management agreement with Steve Rieger and Co.

The board also unanimously approved a motion by Stiles, seconded by Harvey Sookiyak of Shaktoolik, to direct the NSIC management committee to dissolve NSIC and make NSEDC's president and chief executive officer (who at that time was Eugene Asicksik) responsible for relationships with the corporation's active partners and for distributing funds from NSIC to NSEDC. In addition to managing NSEDC's securities portfolio, Rieger had managed the corporation's other income-producing assets such as its ownership interest in Glacier Fish Co.

Asicksik did not concur with the board's decisions to oust Rieger and dissolve NSIC. In October 2006 the board elected Harrelson as board chairman and corporate president of NSEDC. The company's bylaws give all significant administrative powers and responsibilities to the president. Asicksik continued as CEO until he resigned in December 2007.

The board's decision to terminate Rieger's contract proved costly for NSEDC. The company reported compensation of $1.05 million for Rieger in its 2006 Form 990 return to the Internal Revenue Service. NSEDC filed its 2006 return with the IRS in November 2007. In February 2008 Harrelson told the Nugget that the high compensation figure for Rieger in 2006 "includes a monthly management fee paid pursuant to contract, plus a one-time severance payment required to be paid upon termination of the contract."

Harrelson did not respond to requests to differentiate between the amount Rieger received in monthly management fees under his contract through July of 2006 and the amount of the severance payment. Rieger also declined to provide that information.

NSEDC's Form 990 for 2005 shows Reiger received compensation of $521,727, less than half the $1.05 million paid to him in 2006 when he worked only seven months as NSIC's manager. Rieger's earnings reportedly were related to the value of investments held by NSIC.

Structural changes in NSEDC

NSEDC's marketable securities remained invested but were not actively managed for six months after Rieger's contract was terminated. In January 2007 the NSEDC board contracted with UBS Financial Services and Charles Schwab & Co. for management of its stock portfolio, dividing approximately $50 million worth of securities between them. Income from NSEDC's securities investments is not taxable.

As a nonprofit corporation organized under provisions of Section 501(C)4 of the Internal Revenue Code, the company is exempt from federal and state taxes on income, except for taxes on unrelated business income. In 2007 the company reported unrelated business income to the IRS and the State of Alaska and paid unrelated business income tax totaling $10.1 million for fiscal years 2005, 2006 and 2007. That information appears in the company's 2007 annual report, which was published and distributed in May 2009 to box holders in NSEDC's 15 member villages.

In 2008 NSEDC created a wholly owned for-profit subsidiary, Siu

Alaska Corp., to manage the company's taxable assets, which include its ownership interest in Glacier Fish Co. Don Stiles serves as chairman of the Siu Alaska board. In April the NSEDC board elected Paul Johnson as a Siu Alaska board member by a vote of 8 to 7 during a quarterly meeting in Unalakleet. Johnson was defeated in his bid for election to the NSEDC board in October 2007.

Nome crab processing resumes

By Laurie McNicholas

The Norton Sound Seafood Products plant in Nome resumed purchasing red king crab from fishermen on Monday following a two-week suspension due to insufficient meat fill in the legs of crab initially delivered to the plant. "Norton Sound red king crab now has good meat fill," reports Rich Ferry, operations manager for the NSSP northern region.

The summer commercial fishery for red king crab in Norton

Sound opened June 15, eight days earlier than in 2008. Last week Ferry said biologists from the Alaska Department of Fish and Game and Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., which owns NSSP, told him this year's colder than normal spring may have depressed the crabs' metabolism and kept them from gaining weight after their molt.

ADF&G kept the fishery open while the Nome plant was closed because AquaTech, an Anchorage firm that buys Norton Sound red king crab from Unalakleet fisherman Clarence Towarak, sampled crabs from Towarak's first delivery and found them filled with meat. Towarak may have been fishing in a different area of the sound than crabbers who delivered their catches to NSSP.

This summer's Norton Sound commercial red king crab quota is 375,000 pounds.

Adventurer still determined after rescue

RESCUE—An MH-60 Jayhawk helicopter crew from Air Station Kodiak prepares the rescue of a French kayaker from the Bering Sea Saturday. The crew from Air Station Kodiak hoisted Jean Gabriel Shelala, 28, from his kayak 40 miles north of St. Lawrence Island at about 4:15 p.m.

By Tyler Rhodes

Wet, tired, alone and cold, Jean-Gabriel Chelala huddled in his kayak dozens of miles north of St. Lawrence Island in the frigid Bering Sea July 4.

After not seeing a soul since he left Emmonak nearly a week before, he mulled over the only two options he could fathom for himself. He could try to summon the energy to make landfall—most likely somewhere on the Seward Peninsula roughly 100 nautical miles away—or he could make the call on his satellite phone that would summon the Coast Guard to his rescue.

After laboring through a storm that lasted more than a day and already mildly hypothermic with reports of more bad weather on the horizon, the 28-year-old Frenchman made what was likely one of the more difficult calls of his life. “I knew it was the limit. I don’t think I could have gone another night,” Chelala said.

Within eight hours of that call July 4, a Coast Guard Jayhawk helicopter was hovering above him, its rescue basket descending to the sea. Clutching a yellow dry-bag full of all his valuable gear for the trip, Chelala was hauled into the helicopter leaving his boat and a number of minor possessions to the Bering Sea 40 miles north of the island. “The Bering Sea, it’s horrible. It’s dangerous, very dangerous,” he said as he mulled over the ordeal while sitting in a cafe in Nome July 7.

The rescue, in a way, put an end to a vision Chelala had of crossing the globe solo completely under his own power. While many may scoff at yet another rescue of a person attempting to cross the Bering Sea between Alaska and Russia, Chelala’s journey to that rough spot 40 miles north of St. Lawrence Island is nothing short of impressive.

The voyage started in January 2008 from Paris. From the French capital, Chelala biked, paddled, boated and kayaked his way approximately 1,400 miles to the point where a helicopter would scoop him from the sea. He had biked from Paris to Portugal, traversed the Atlantic in a paddle boat and biked from Florida to Whitehorse in the Yukon Territory. Along the way he had dodged large ocean-going ships, sea mammals and countless storms.

King salmon subsistence and sport fishing closed in southern Norton Sound as pink salmon opens

The Alaska Department of Fish and Game closed subsistence and sport fishing for king salmon in the Shaktoolik and Unalakleet subdistricts on July 4. No king salmon commercial fishery was held in the subdistricts this year. Following is the text of a press release issued by ADF&G July 3.

“In the Unalakleet Subdistrict, reported subsistence catches and Unalakleet River king salmon test net catches have been much better than anticipated for late June. However, king salmon passage at a counting tower located on the North River, a tributary of the Unalakleet River, has been very weak, raising concerns that the king salmon escapement goal might not be met this season.

“Marine subsistence catches peaked during the recent 48-hour period ending Saturday, June 27 when 296 king salmon were caught. Subsistence catches in the lower Unalakleet River also peaked on June 27 when 203 king salmon were caught. Sport catches of king salmon in the Unalakleet River have been reported to be good as well. As of July 2, the North River salmon counting tower has only enumerated 90 king salmon, well below the recent 5-year average passage estimate of 200 king salmon.

The historical quarter-point of the king salmon run at the North River is July 4. Cumulative king salmon passage estimates suggest that the lower end of the North River tower escapement goal range of 1,200-2,600 king salmon will not be reached.

“In order to conserve king salmon and reach escapement goals, subsistence salmon fishing with set gillnets will close in the marine waters of the Shaktoolik and Unalakleet Subdistricts effective 6:00 p.m. Saturday, July 4. Subsistence salmon fishing for king salmon in the Unalakleet River, and the king salmon sport fishery in both the Unalakleet and Shaktoolik Rivers will also close effective 8:00 p.m. Saturday, July 4. Any king salmon incidentally hooked while targeting other salmon species must be immediately released into the river. In addition, bait may not be used while sport fishing in these drainages while this closure is in effect.

“Immediately following the closure to the king salmon subsistence fishery, the department will open up the Shaktoolik and Unalakleet River drainages to beach seining seven days a week. This will provide subsistence fishermen with opportunity to target other salmon species and take advantage of the good drying weather. However, as with sport fishing, beach seining is closed to the retention of king salmon. Any king salmon incidentally caught in seines must be returned to the water immediately.”

Pink salmon commercial fishing opens

ADF&G announced a July 8 opening date for commercial fishing for Norton Sound pink salmon in a press release issued July 6. Following are excerpts from the release.

“Commercial salmon fishing will be permitted in the Shaktoolik and Unalakleet Subdistricts for one 24-hour period from 6:00 p.m. Wednesday, July 8 until 6:00 p.m. Thursday, July 9. Permit holders are restricted to 100 fathoms of net in aggregate length and gillnets must have a mesh size of 4 inches or less. The Shaktoolik Subdistrict consists of all waters from the westernmost tip of Cape Denbigh to the mouth of Junction Creek. The Unalakleet Subdistrict consists of all waters from the mouth of Junction Creek to the tip of Black Point....

“Commercial permit holders are required to have a current Norton Sound commercial salmon permit and

photo [identification] when commercial fishing. Any crewmember helping with fishing operations must also have a crewmember’s license in their possession, regardless of their age. Commercial salmon fishers are also reminded that commercial salmon fishing is prohibited at all times within any stream or river, and within 500 yards in any direction of a salmon stream regardless of the tide stage. Any king salmon incidentally caught during this period must be recorded in the personal use section located at the bottom of the fish ticket. Due to king salmon conservation concerns, king salmon may not be sold commercial this season, and must be retained for subsistence purposes.

“This brief commercial fishing period will provide the department with an early index of pink salmon run strength and will not jeopardize pink subsistence fishing or escapement needs. Additionally, using 4 1/2-inch mesh will allow fishermen to selectively target pink salmon while conserving king salmon. Last season the incidental king salmon catch during directed pink salmon openings was very low and was comprised of small kings. The department will review catch data from the July 8th period to determine if additional commercial pink salmon fishing is warranted.”

Payenna, Eaton top the field in annual Anvil Mountain Run

By Tyler Rhodes

Teddy Payenna must be getting a little bit lonely during Nome's summer running races.

Not too long after the starting gun has fired, Payenna, 16, has had the course all to himself the past two races, the competition trailing by several minutes.

Payenna's mantle, however, is likely becoming a crowded place as he walked away from Saturday's 12.5-mile Anvil Mountain Run with two blue trophies—one for winning overall and the other for being the first under 16 to cross the finish line. Payenna topped the field of 19 runners, tackling the course that loops from downtown Nome to up and over Anvil Mountain and back in 1 hour, 20 minutes and 25 seconds.

The course, run since the early 1980s, takes runners from downtown Nome to the Nome-Teller Highway. Runners then turn off on the Dexter Pass road before hitting the first checkpoint at the base of the road that climbs to the White Alice towers atop Anvil Mountain. Passing the towers at the second checkpoint, runners continue across the mountaintop ridge to the check point at the rock formation for which the hill is named. From there runners work to stay upright as they bomb down the mountain to the Old Glacier Creek Road and the final checkpoint. From there, the runners are free to make their way back to City Hall by any route they choose.

Payenna was chased by last year's winner, Tyler Rhodes, for approximately half the run before he was able to break free a little past the half-way mark up the climb to the top of Anvil Mountain. Payenna stretched his lead to more than three minutes by the time he crossed the finish line back on Front Street. Rhodes held on for second place in 1:23:54, followed by Greg Finstad at 1:26:45.

The women's race offered a more competitive finish as Erika Eaton battled Marta Muntean the entire race. The two were neck-and-neck until shortly before the finish when Eaton was able to surge and pull out the win by a half minute at 1:43:55. AnnieKate Olson grabbed third place, finishing in 1:58:08.

Olson stepped across the finish just a couple seconds ahead of her father, David Olson, who placed 11th among the men. The Olson family are perennial fixtures in Nome's longest running race. The first Olson to cross the line this year was another one of David's children, Nathaniel, who finished fourth in 1:27:56.

Before the race even started, David Olson received an award from race organizer Leo Rasmussen. Olson was presented with a Alaska statehood 50-year medallion to honor his 25th consecutive running of the race. Over that quarter century, Olson said he has seen fields as small as seven runners and then watched the number of entrants swell large before it evened out to the 20 or so who have signed up in the past few years. Although organizers swear the course has not changed, Olson, who is 53, is not so sure. "I think the hill gets steeper and the miles get longer," he said. "I don't think it has anything to do with getting older."

This year's race also featured another family, of sorts. Three crewmembers of the sailboat Ocean Watch joined the ranks of the finishers. The boat was ported in Nome over the Fourth of July weekend during its journey on which it will attempt to circumnavigate North and South America. Bryan Reeves led the sailors, taking 6th overall in 1:32:26. David Thoreson crossed the line in 10th for the men and Tyler Osberg was 12th. Osberg and Reeves are spending short stints on the boat while Thoreson is in it for the long haul (see story on page 1).

Running conditions for the day were pleasant, with the overcast skies and a ridge-top breeze helping keep the competitors cool. Brief showers on Friday evening helped cut down on the dust, but also made the descent off Anvil Mountain a bit slippery for those who eschewed the trail for the more direct route over the tundra.

While the top half of finishers were able to collect themselves a bit before the rest of the 4th of July excitement started, the latter half of the field found themselves running head on into the end of the parade as it made its way down Front Street.

HOROSCOPES

July 9 - 15, 2009

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 19

Big deal, Capricorn. You had a slip in judgment. So has everyone else. Fess up and move on. A well-deserved vacation is in your future. Start saving for it now.

ARIES
March 21–April 19

Praise comes to you from all sides for your recent efforts. Don't let it go to your head, Aries. There is much left to do. A news piece encourages you to get more involved in the community.

CANCER
June 22–July 22

Fishing for information is not the way, Cancer. Ask and you will receive. A little time apart from a friend puts everything into perspective.

LIBRA
September 23–October 22

Whoa, Libra. You've taken on too many requests as it is. Learn to say no, or risk complete failure. A chance meeting results in a very lucrative opportunity.

AQUARIUS
January 20–February 18

Time to get tough at home, Aquarius. Your to-do list is a mile long, and if you don't start pitching a fit, your pleas for help will fall on deaf ears.

TAURUS
April 20–May 20

The fur flies at home, Taurus, and you must work quickly to resolve it. An opportunity ripens; pick it before it's too late. The truth comes out at work.

LEO
July 23–August 22

The tide changes at work, Leo, and you are given the green light for a project. Push full steam ahead and ignore your critics. You will prove them wrong.

SCORPIO
October 23–November 21

Time to get your facts straight, Scorpio. The rumor mill is in high gear, and you don't want to add fuel to the fire. Special times with friends and family boost your spirits.

PISCES
February 19–March 20

Uh-oh, Pisces. A relationship is in a rut. Spice things up with a trip to someplace exotic. A project at work spirals out of control. Work to get it back on track quickly.

GEMINI
May 21–June 21

Making peace is never easy, Gemini, but the time has come. Reconciliation is long past due. A wish is granted; be grateful. A note piques your curiosity.

VIRGO
August 23–September 22

Ignorance is bliss this week, Virgo. Keep to yourself and stay away from all of the fodder. The less you know, the less likely you are to get into trouble.

SAGITTARIUS
November 22–December 21

Aw shucks, Sagittarius. Your run of good luck comes to an end, but that doesn't mean you have to be a worrywart. Play it safe, and life will continue to treat you well.

• Rescue

He arrived in Whitehorse Nov. 10, hanging up his bike and suspending his trip for the winter. When spring arrived, he returned and kayaked down the Yukon River to the village of Emmonak at the river's mouth. There, he waited out cold, stormy weather for a break when he would attempt to row to Gambell and then later on to the Russian coast.

Chelala left Emmonak June 28. Those weather improvements that prompted his departure, however, were short-lived. By June 30, his website reported deteriorating weather and a struggle against the wind and currents that would change with the gusts.

On July 3, he saw the coast of St. Lawrence Island. He had nearly made it.

The Bering Sea, however, had other plans.

The winds and current continued to push him north to the point that a landfall on the island was out of the question. So started what Chelala described as an ensuing "36 hours of hell" that included a battering by a storm that at its worst pounded him with 40-knot winds and 15- to 20-foot seas. Despite the rough conditions, Chelala said he was not worried about the integrity of his boat, but rather the toll the cold was taking on him.

The kayak was designed with a special canopy that could close to keep Chelala out of the elements. The problem was that the condensation produced by his body heat and respiration pooled up inside the boat to the point where he had inches of water in the hull. Constantly wet with no relent in the weather to dry out, the cold was continually sapping his heat and energy. "I didn't imagine I could have so much condensation in the kayak," he said.

He said he would shake and twist to try and generate body heat to keep warm, but it was to no avail.

Before leaving Emmonak, Chelala had befriended an Alaska State Trooper, who he called from the kayak to see if any fishermen may be out in the area to render him assistance. The Trooper told him that the weather was keeping boats in port and most area fishermen would likely not motor the distance to his location even if the weather were to improve.

By Saturday, the weather had improved a bit, but not to the point where Chelala could dry his gear or himself. When Chelala was advised by a contact in France that the weather report called for another storm by Monday, he felt he had no other option but to call for help. "I wasn't ready to take on another storm," he said.

Once plucked from the sea by the Coast Guard helicopter, Chelala was flown to Nome where he was treated and released from the Norton Sound Regional Hospital for mild hypothermia. As of Tuesday, he was still in Nome working out a plan to continue his journey. He planned to travel to Anchorage on Wednesday to meet with the French consulate to discuss his options. From this point, Chelala said he is considering flying to Provideniya or Anadyr, Russia, and continuing his journey by land.

Whatever solution he finds, Chelala is determined to press on. He is surprisingly upbeat following an ordeal that would have sent so many others packing. He admits his voyage will now take on a different character as he will most likely have to rely on power other than his own to traverse the Bering Sea. Nevertheless, the young man feels his journey is not compromised in relation to the message he is trying to spread. "I wanted to do something to encourage people to believe in themselves," he said.

Chelala's message is all about the power and potential humanity has if they believe in their abilities. "When you put all of your energy into success, you succeed," he said. "One man with one head and one body can do the impossible."

Saying it Sincerely

By Pastor Julie Yoder Elmore, Community United Methodist Church
For the Nome Ministerial Association

Rejoice! Let your gentleness be evident to all. The Lord is near. Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God. And the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus. (Philippians 4:4-7)

Do you ever find that worry gets the best of you? Worry about money, worry over a job, worry over a loved one who is making poor choices?

Worry can bring us down and prevent us from becoming the people that God created us to be. God created us to trust in God and praise God for all the things God has done in our lives. When we are anxious about the worries of life, it is real easy to lose sight of the blessings God has given us.

When I was at seminary orientation, I learned a song from the Taizé Community called "In the Lord I'll Be Ever Thankful." When we were transitioning between activities at orientation, we would sing this song several times. The lyrics are as follows:

In the Lord I'll be ever thankful

In the Lord I will rejoice

Look to God, do not be afraid.

Lift up your voices the Lord is near.

Lift up your voices the Lord is near. (from The Faith We Sing #2195)

This song reminded us that as we were beginning a new chapter, God was with us. God was the one who had called us in that time and that place to begin our seminary education. It was no coincidence. God called us there. We were very grateful to be there, yet worried what challenges this new adventure might bring. For some of us, we were following a call to ministry and this was the next step on the journey. For others of us, we were fulfilling a lifelong dream to seek God through education. I worried if others would like me and ended up meeting many great friends including my husband, David. I worried if I was going to do well in my classes. Perhaps at first I was not getting the grades I anticipated, but by the end of my seminary career I was doing much better. Worrying and dwelling on whether or not I would be accepted or get the best grades would have kept me from becoming the pastor – the servant of God – that God was calling me to be. I gave my requests to God and God provided.

What in your life do you worry about that is keeping you from leading a full life of peace in God? Remember that God is there to help with your worries – give them to God and rejoice in all that God has already given you, including God's son Jesus Christ. God is faithful and God is good.

Nome man pleads guilty to attempted sexual assault

By Tyler Rhodes

A Nome man pleaded guilty to charges of attempted sexual assault before Superior Court Judge Ben Esch July 2 after reaching a deal with prosecutors.

In a hearing held at the Nome Courthouse, Calvin Gooden, 41, waived his right to an indictment and pleaded guilty to the one felony count. The plea deal calls for a prison sentence of three years, two years of suspended sentence and a five-year probation period. Gooden will also be required to register as a sexual offender for at least 15 years.

Gooden was initially charged in March with one count of first-degree sexual assault and one count of second-degree sexual abuse of a minor. According to the Nome Police Department at the time, a juvenile victim came to the department to report a sexual assault. The charges levied against Gooden before the deal pertained to a victim between the ages of 13 and 15.

The charge of attempted sexual assault is levied when someone takes a substantial step toward making sexual contact with someone against their will, Judge Esch said at the July 2 hearing. A Class C felony, the charge carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a $50,000 fine.

Sentencing for Gooden is scheduled for Nov. 9 at 3:30 p.m. He remains free until that time under a $2,500 bond posted in late March. Other conditions of his release require that when he is not at work, he must be with his wife who is acting as his third-party custodian.

Friends of Pilgrim Hot Springs focus on historic site preservation

By Laurie McNicholas

The Friends of Pilgrim Hot Springs met June 25 to discuss ideas for preserving a church and other buildings associated with the former orphanage and boarding school as an historic site, and preserving a cemetery on the 320-acre property 60 miles northeast of Nome. The group established priorities to:

- encourage everyone who values Pilgrim Hot Springs to write individual letters to Bishop Donald Kettler of the Diocese of Fairbanks, which owns the property, asking him to ensure that future leaseholders accommodate public visits to the site;
- find out from the State of Alaska whether the right of way for the public access road from the Kougarak Highway to Pilgrim Hot Springs expired in 2005 and whether a right of way requirement applies to the entire seven-mile road;
- write letters to Sen. Donny Olson and Rep. Richard Foster requesting a legislative waiver of the right of way requirement for the road if the right of way has expired;
- advocate for the State to invest in developing the geothermal energy resource at Pilgrim Hot Springs.

During the meeting Nancy McGuire circulated a letter she will send to Bishop Kettler describing the spiritual significance of Pilgrim Hot Springs to her and other area residents and asking that it remain open to visitors.

The Catholic Church operated an orphanage and boarding school at Pilgrim Hot Springs from 1918, when it became the home of Seward Peninsula children whose parents died in the influenza pandemic, until the early 1940s. The property was listed on the National Register of Historic Places in 1977.

Generations of Nomeites and others with ties to Pilgrim Hot Springs have repeatedly journeyed there for picnics, campouts or to soak in hot tubs. Tourists are drawn to the diverse bird life, historic buildings and beauty of the setting.

The Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska, which is the legal corporate name for the Diocese of Fairbanks, received possession of Pilgrim Hot Springs from Art Neuman of PS, Ltd. in federal bankruptcy court last December after the court determined that PS, Ltd. was a non-performing leaseholder. PS, Ltd. took a 99-year lease on the property in 1969 in exchange for $500 a month and 10 percent of royalties, but did not develop the property.

Diocesan administrators currently are seeking leaseholders to develop income-producing ventures on the site. Under a Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization plan the CBNA has filed in a federal court, income derived from development of Pilgrim Hot Springs will be used to help pay individuals who have filed claims of sexual abuse by certain priests and volunteers.

Tom Buzek, business administrator for the Diocese of Fairbanks, began meeting last February with The Friends of Pilgrim Hot Springs, an informal group of about two dozen Nomeites who are interested in preserving the site for the many Seward Peninsula residents who value it.

At a town meeting June 11 in Nome, Buzek described four phases of potential development for Pilgrim has twice circumnavigated the globe solo and advocates for stewardship of the marine environment he loves. David Thoreson, a photographer and cameraman who has already once sailed through the passage, is documenting the journey through images and film. "The times I've done the passage before, it's been for my own interest. This time, there's more purpose," Thoreson said.

Chronicling the voyage through the written word is Herb McCormick, a former sailing magazine editor and veteran ocean racer. The fourth member of the full-time crew is first mate David Logan who was instrumental in getting the Ocean Watch ready for the voyage and handles on board systems and logistics during the journey. "We're all sailors and adventurers. We decided it was time to become ocean stewards," Schrader said.

Joining the crew who will make the entire year-long trip will be a number of scientists and educators who will augment the crew's ranks for varying periods of time. The full-time crew will also perform work and relay findings and data to land-based scientists all over the nation. Participating entities include the University of Washington, Yale, Columbia and NASA.

It's not only the humans that will be conducting the scientific work. Rigged with all sorts of monitoring devices, the ship is a moving NOAA weather station. The Ocean Watch also has a camera mounted outside that takes 48,000 photos a day, spanning all 360 degrees around the boat. The camera allows photos to be linked to any weather or other data that is gathered.

Currently filling the role of scientist on the journey is Michael Reynolds, a meteorologist and physical oceanographer. Part of the work Reynolds is conducting is measuring how much heat is both entering and leaving the ocean. He is also gathering data measuring baseline data on water conditions, measuring its temperature, acidity and oxygen content. Much of the work will establish baseline data on ocean conditions for an entire lap around the Americas. "There aren't many research vessels that will do an entire circuit," he said. "We're not out to prove anything. It's just kind of a voyage of discovery."

The ship will pick up an ice expert to fill the scientist slot on the boat once they reach Cambridge Bay on the western side of the passage. Reynolds plans to again join the journey at a later time.

Education is another large priority of the Around the Americas expedition. The Ocean Watch will pick up its first of several onboard educators in Barrow who will sail with the crew until Boston or New York. The teacher, as Reynolds describes it, will translate the scientific work for the general public and youth—a population segment who Captain Schrader feels is largely ignored when it comes to education on the marine environment. "What we discovered is that it's the rare school that has time to talk about ocean science," he said at an evening forum in Nome July 2.

To that end, the crew set up a program at the Kegoayah Kozga Library during its summer reading program to talk about their voyage and the importance of preserving the oceans. "It's our job as the human race to understand how fragile the ocean environment is. ... It's important to us that the awareness issue translates into an education curriculum," Schrader said. "Our partner in Seattle at the Pacific Science Center has put together a fabulous marine science curriculum for teachers. It's free and in Spanish and English. As we go around stop to stop for 25,000 miles to talk about those issues, we direct people to our website [www.aroundtheamericas.com] to give teachers the tools to teach marine science in the classroom."

In addition to the library session and an evening presentation at the Bering Land Bridge National Preserve Interpretive Center in Nome, the crew gave tours of the ship for four hours in the afternoon of July 2. Nomeites young and old clambered down the ladder to the Ocean Watch and were given free reign to roam about the ship asking questions. Crew members were kept busy answering questions like, "Do you get seasick?" and showing curious guests where they slept.

But it wasn't all work while the Ocean Watch was in Nome. Crew members were able to participate in the town's Independence Day festivities, including the parade and street games. Three brave souls even competed in the 12.5-mile Anvil Mountain Race.

Timing, patience are key

As the Ocean Watch departs Nome, the crew will head to Barrow where they will wait for the ice conditions to open up and allow them to sneak through the Northwest Passage. On July 2, Schrader said the bottleneck of ice preventing a traverse is right about mid-passage right now.

While anxious to make progress, Schrader is also wise enough to know to take his time and wait while he must in ports where he can still provision his ship and have distractions for the crew. While there will likely be some wait time in Barrow, the lack of a deep port near town means more work in getting to and from shore. "The key to making this is patience," Thoreson said.

While an accomplished sailor, Schrader has yet to attempt a crossing of the Northwest Passage. He admits that he will be a bit on edge until he can close that chapter in this voyage. "I've been around the Horn twice. I think that was a cakewalk compared to what we could encounter in the passage," he said. "I'll be nervous until the only ice we see is in the rear-view mirror."

Schrader said the journey has two time-sensitive pinch points, the Northwest Passage and Cape Horn. Judging by conditions during the past few years, he anticipates making it out of the east side of the passage in mid-August. "If we don't make it through, this trip becomes a year and 14 months instead of just 14 months," he said.

On the other end of the globe, Cape Horn needs to be tackled in December due to sea and wind conditions. "Unless you're an absolute fool there's only one time you can go around Cape Horn," Thoreson said.

While the ship is a sailboat, much of the voyage thus far has been under motor. Schrader said he expects to employ the sails more when the voyage makes its way to the East Coast and around South America. In the balance he estimates that 50 percent of the entire trip will be done under sail.

The boat itself is a gorgeous craft. Previously named the Danzante III, the 20-year-old vessel that had been living quarters for scientists in Mexico underwent major renovations before its rebirth as the Ocean Watch. While in Nome, the crew did not hesitate in lauding first mate Logan for his work in preparing the ship for sail.

As the preparations were made over the last three years for the voyage, economic conditions forced the team to shave the project from a budget of $8 million down to $2.5 million—a cut made without sacrificing the educational and scientific aspects of the trip.

Major funding for this project is coming from Tiffany & Co., the Rockefeller Family and the Osberg Family Trust. "The Tiffany Foundation actually has a great interest in coral reef preservation [they don't use any in their jewelry]," Schrader said. "They also have a very large interest in how gold is extracted. They came to us with a very large grant because of the education components on this trip. The Rockefeller Family has been very generous in their time and contributions to the efforts because David Rockefeller is a sailor and started an organization called Sailors for the Sea, trying to get sailors more actively involved in ocean health issues."

The Ocean Watch's progress and more information on the project can be found online at www.aroundtheamericas.com.

Chum runs the worst on record

Northern Norton Sound run at historic low, targets being hit in southern sound

By Laurie McNicholas

In mid-July the salmon runs in southern Norton Sound were coming in as projected, but in northern Norton Sound the chum salmon runs were the worst on record, and sockeye (red salmon) returns were well below expectations, reports Jim Menard, area management biologist for Norton Sound and Kotzebue for the Alaska Department of Fish and Game.

The cumulative tally of chum salmon past most counting projects in northern Norton Sound were at record lows in mid-July, the average historic midpoint of the run, and Menard projects that the chum run will finish well below escapement goals this year.

The ADF&G closed all chum salmon fishing and all salmon net fishing in the Nome subdistrict July 15. The only legal subsistence gear for salmon fishing is hook and line. Any chum salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released while in the water. Sport

Council-approved resolution changed before permit given

By Laurie McNicholas

On July 20 City Manager Josie Bahnke provided The Nome Nugget with a copy of the official City of Nome Resolution No. R-09-06-04 issuing a Moonlight Wells permit renewal to Nome AK Gold Concentrates (NAGC) for the 2009 mining season.

The permit allows Marvin Rapose, dba

NAGC, to conduct placer mining within the Moonlight Wells Protection Area from which Nome draws its drinking water.

There is a significant difference between the official signed version of the resolution and the version approved by the Nome City Council at a regular meeting June 22. The official resolution renews NAGC’s annual permit for the 2009 mining season subject to removal of all violations from the mine site. The version of R-09-06-04 approved by the council June 22 stipulated granting a temporary permit to NAGC effective in a week after the council adopted the resolution, subject to removal of all violations from the mine site, as recommended by Public Works Director Bill Angus.

However, Angus issued an annual permit for 2009 to NAGC on June 24 after verifying that all violations had been removed from the site just two days after the council meeting.

The version of R-09-06-04 approved by the council June 22 included the following four

Delay in pumping puts Rock Creek in hot water

By Tyler Rhodes

In what state regulators are essentially summing up as a case of too little, too late, Rock Creek Mine operator NovaGold was hit with a notice of violation July 2 in regard to its effort to remove water from behind its tailings dam.

“The things we highlighted in that notice of violation were that they were three months late in starting [water] treatment and disposal, and that they were not treating water at the rate they said they would,” said Sharmon Stam- baugh, a program manager within the Division of Water at the state Department of Environmental Conservation.

The issue stems from the mine’s effort to remove the more than 50 million gallons of water that has accumulated behind its tailings dam at the idled mine site just a few miles northwest of Nome. The water, largely the result of runoff and groundwater, has regulators concerned over the dam that was never meant to have so much liquid behind it. “The [water treatment plant] capacity and combined injection well capacity was established to prevent increases in water storage behind the tailings storage facility which has the potential to compromise the integrity of the dam,” the notice of violation reads.

The dam was designed to hold back primarily tailings—the waste left over when the gold is extracted from the ore—which are more or less solid in their consistency. Very few tailings, however, were deposited in the storage facility since work at the mine was suspended last November just as NovaGold was moving the project into production.

After two winters of heavy snowfall and a miscalculation by NovaGold on how water moves and collects around the mine site, the tailings storage facility gathered significant amounts of water. “Essentially we had an incorrect estimate on the water balance,” said NovaGold President and Chief Executive Officer Rick Van Nieuwenhuyse. “That and a 100-year storm event is why the water ended up behind the dam.”

To remove the water, NovaGold built a treatment plant on the mine site and drilled a number of wells to inject the treated water back into the aquifer. The rate at which NovaGold accomplished the task became the fodder for the state DEC’s notice of violation.

“It’s not that it’s not operational and not that it’s not working as it should,” Van Nieuwenhuyse said. “The water treatment plant is operational.”

The mine’s temporary closure plan called for the plant and wells to be able to treat and inject 350 gallons per minute by Feb. 15. The DEC said the plan also called for the treatment plant to be able to handle rates from

City lagoon eyed for mine’s wastewater

By Tyler Rhodes

As the Rock Creek Mine works to meet a state mandate to treat and pump water from behind its tailings dam, it is mulling the possibility of piping that water in the future to the City of Nome’s sewer lagoons.

NovaGold Resources President and Chief Executive Officer Rick Van Nieuwenhuyse said the mining firm has been in discussions with Nome Joint Utility System over the creation a pipeline from its water treatment plant at the mine site to connect to the city’s wastewater treatment system. “At this point it’s a concept,” Van Nieuwenhuyse said. “We think it’s an interesting long-term solution.”

The idled mine is currently working to rid the area behind its tailings dam of more than 50 million gallons of water by pumping it through injection wells (see related story above). Even if the mine realizes its goal of having the facility emptied of water by the end of this year, Van Nieuwenhuyse acknowledges the water will return. “Obviously there’s always going to be some water

Dear Litterbugs,

I was out on the Council Road the other day, and the Teller Road the day before and the Kougarok Road the day before that and I noticed that you lost your stuff. You can find it all along the side of the roads and off into the countryside. I also picked up a few bags full of the stuff if you'd like to stop by and claim them. I figure you're dearly missing your valuables, and I don't like looking at them, so pick them up and knock it off.

I realize that litterbugs probably don't read newspapers, mostly they just throw them on the ground. So, those of you reading this, if you wouldn't mind passing the message on, that would be great.

Sincerely,
Moriah Sallaffie
Nome, AK
P.S. Once you pick up your garbage and stop littering, I might like you better.

Hello,

I am writing regarding my grandson's pup that we had to put to sleep.

I had the pup tested for a disease that we and other people suspected. Well, my grandson had one of those dogs that does not grow very big, in fact it was very small. We all know that these little dogs can be very territorial and a little vicious. My grandson dearly loved his dog and his dog loved him and followed him wherever he went.

My grandson, whose name is Elijah, lives mostly with his great-grandmother whose name is Mary Seppilu. At the time of the death of his beloved great-grandpa (David Seppilu), my daughter and my son-in-law decided to buy him a pup from a local person. The pup really helped him heal his broken heart about his grandpa.

Well, the pup had bitten a couple of children, who I might say had no parent or parents watching over them. That's when suspicion began of some sort of disease the dog might have. Coincidentally the children bitten got ill. I apologize to the families. I myself knew the pup was clean because he also bit my grandson while he was playing with him. He got a small scratch from the bite, I was concerned but my grandson is fine.

To make things clear, as a family, we decided to put the dog to sleep and send him out for testing. Just as I expected, the dog came out clean and healthy. Now my grandson will be broken hearted all over again when he finds out what we did to his dog. Maybe it's a lesson for us and other parents to watch their toddlers when they are playing out by themselves.

Elijah's pup's name was Twister. We all learned to love him, though he was a bit ugly. I ask at this time if anyone might want to donate a nice husky pup or a similar dog with a very nice nature. I would really appreciate it very much.

Well thank you, Nancy, and we again apologize to the families whose children got bitten, but rest assured, the dog's test came in very clean. We will have the results in writing if anyone wants proof. The vet in Nome will send the proper documents of the disease-free dog.

How Far Do We Bend?

We granted a permit to mine in our watershed. Wait, maybe we didn't. The last city council meeting was cancelled, but somehow a permit seems to have been granted, or was it? Perhaps Nome Common Council needs to bring the resolution back to the table. We have a process, let's follow it.

Nomeites have a lot of things to keep their eyes on. There's a hint that the Rock Creek Mine might want to drain its tailings pond into Nome's Sewage Lagoon. What happened to all those injection wells? What kind of hose are they going to run across eight miles of tundra? Visualize a hose that looks like a gigantic lawn sprinkler. Rock Creek Mine is not within the Nome City Limits. We should not let them even think of using the Nome Sewage Lagoon. Heck, they still owe Nome Joint Utilities $1.9 million for their unpaid electric bill.

Snake oil is everywhere and the salesmen are slathering it on us. They want us to take all the risks with no gains. Our elected officials and the residents of Nome need to know how to adhere to our regulations and filter out the fertilizer. We should not give away the store and lose our shirts in the process. If we keep bending the rules we will break the system. — N.L.M. —

Governor Palin, Parnell tour northwest Alaska

Before still-Governor Sarah Palin started to pack boxes in the preparation of her move out of the Governor's mansion in Juneau, she visited Kotzebue and Unalakleet last week. The Associated Press reports that she had been received in Unalakleet like a rock star and while there, she signed a power cost equalization program bill into law. PCE is a program designed to make power more affordable to rural Alaskans by covering the cost of electricity that exceeds 12 cents per kilowatt hour for the first 500 kilowatt hours used by a household each month. On Friday, soon-to-be Governor Sean Parnell visited Kotzebue and attended a groundbreaking ceremony for the Kotzebue Shore Avenue Reconstruction Project. The multi-million dollar project involves major improvements to the city's oceanfront business area. Department of Transportation Commissioner Leo Von Scheben, Deputy Commissioner Frank Richards and Northern Region Director Steve Titus also attended. So far, Parnell, who is going to be sworn in as governor next weekend in Fairbanks, has not announced any changes in the cabinet.

Sex offender sentenced to 99 years

Bethel— John Leopold of Alakanuk has been sentenced to 99 years in prison for sexual assault in the first degree and incest. Superior Court Judge Leonard Devaney imposed the sentence last Thursday, based upon Leopold's convictions after a jury trial in Bethel in April on those counts and on sexual assault in the second degree. Leopold had two prior felony convictions, for sexual assault in the second degree and assault in the third degree. At Thursday's sentencing hearing, reports indicated that he had victimized at least six people in incidents of sexual assault or sexual abuse dating from 1986. Leopold's sentence is literally 99 years as, due to a prior sexual assault felony, he will not be able to accrue "good time."

EPA reviews Kensington mine dumping tailings in lake

The regional office of the US Environmental Protection Agency is looking into the Kensington gold mine's plan to dump mine tailings into Lower Slate Lake. EPA regional director sent a letter to start an eight-month review process on the proposal. A recent Supreme Court ruling overturned a 9th District Court of Appeals decision to allow the mine operators Coeur Alaska to use the lake as a tailings facility. A local environmental group had sued to halt the proposed rock waste dumping in a lake situated in Tongass National Forest. The state of Alaska joined Coeur in the litigation. State officials push to expedite the issuance of this last required permit. Also, U.S. Senators Lisa Murkowski and Mark Begich are not happy about the EPA's letter, arguing that the mine has promised to create 300 new jobs in the area. At the request of Murkowski and Begich, EPA administrator Lisa Jackson will come to Murkowski's office next week to meet with them and attempt to explain EPA's actions on this issue. Coeur spokesman Tony Ebersole said additional delays could cost the company millions of dollars.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers as the entity to deal with permits under the Clean Water Act, opened a 15 day comment period about proposed modifications to the permit issued in 2005 to Coeur Alaska, Inc., authorizing construction of a mine tailings storage facility in Lower Slate Lake. The comment period ends on Aug. 3. The modification updates and corrects wetland mapping information and drawings contained in the permit modification issued on June 17, 2005. A total of 83.4 acres of fill was authorized under the previously issued permit, and as of December 2008, 45.2 acres of waters and wetlands had been filled.

King Island community debates $400,000 for road projects

Proposals include ferry to King Island, trails and road improvements to Cape Woolley Road

By Sandra L. Medearis

The King Island Community met July 18 to discuss new money available for improvement projects on roads, routes and trails of interest to subsistence users, country travelers and city drivers.

This roads fix-up pot holds $400,000 from the American Recovery and Re-investment Act of 2009. Translation: federal economic stimulus funds.

The money can be used by King Island Community IRA itself or in partnership with other Native corporations or government entities like the City of Nome. Dust control and better access to Cape Woolley Lagoon, even a Cape Woolley coastal area ferry system, loomed big in the two hours' discussion at Old St. Joe's meeting hall.

"This is a new development on the national level to include tribes' input on their transportation needs," said Lisa Ellanna, King Island Community IRA transportation planner. "We are learning all of this together. This is the first meeting of many. We would like to get an idea on where our members would like to focus."

Any project selected has to be ready for the shovels by 2010.

Based on comment at the meeting, King Island people want better routes to traditional subsistence food gathering areas and to their homeland, King Island, lying in the Bering Sea 92 miles off Nome.

"It is important to our people to have accessibility to our island," IRA Council member Marilyn Koezuna Irelan said. "It would help our thinking and to be stronger and more unified. Young people need to know it is their land where there is clean air and no cars."

It has been difficult for people to exist on the mainland since King Island people had to relocate to Nome in the 1960s, she said.

Money can legally go for these subsistence access improvements, as well as work on roads in town, visiting meeting moderator Julianne Baltar said. Baltar is the manager of All Nations Tribal Transportation Consortium, of which King Island is a member. ANTTC is an independent tribal consortium based in Dillingham. One of its missions is to help member tribes with transportation, construction, project development and maintenance associated with the Indian Reservation Roads Program. ANTTC will also assist city, state and federal road programs. ARRA has $310 million reserved for IRR project assistance nationwide.

Baltar cautioned that any work done with the money would necessarily give public access.

"ARRA funds have to be for public trans-recommendations in a report by Angus that described multiple permit violations at the NAGC mine site—all within the Moonlight Wells Protection area—and Rapose's failure to correct the violations.

"1. Grant temporary permit effective in a week, subject to removal of all violations (verified by me).

"2. Final and proper...disposition of all offensive materials to be physically inspected and verified by me. (It is too easy to simply bury things out there).

"3. Over excavation and proper disposal of all contaminated soils (verified by me prior to backfill).

"4. Submit to random, unrestricted, and unscheduled site inspections at interval not to exceed two weeks."

The official version of resolution R-09-06-04 that Bahnke provided to the Nugget July 20 grants a Moonlight Wells permit to NAGC for the 2009 mining season subject to the following additional conditions:

"1. The permit shall not be issued or effective until the Public works Director has verified that:

"a) all objectionable material has been removed from the site including but not limited to the following:

"i) lead acid batteries
"ii) all 55 gallon drums of various lubricants

"iii) all 5 gallon pails of various lubricants

"iv) all jugs of anti-freeze; and

"b) all contaminated soil on site has been over excavated and properly disposed of.

"2. The Public Works Director shall use the authority granted the City to make random unscheduled inspections pursuant to condition 'B' of the permit at least once every two weeks during the term of the permit." Condition B of the permit reads: "The permittee shall allow the City Manager or his representative access to the permitted sites at reasonable times to conduct scheduled or unscheduled inspections or tests to determine compliance with the permit, City laws, and regulations."

On July 10 a Nugget reporter contacted Bahnke by phone to find out whether Rapose had removed all violations from the mine site and had received a temporary mining permit from the City. Bahnke said Angus had issued an annual permit, not a temporary permit, to Rapose June 24 after verifying that all permit violations had been removed from the site. She faxed a copy of the permit to the Nugget.

The permit states that it is effective upon approval by the Nome City Council by resolution and cites R-09-06-04 as the authorizing resolution. The permit is dated June 24, signed by Angus and Rapose and attested by City Clerk Sandy Sturgis-Babcock. On July 10, the Nugget reporter phoned Sturgis-Babcock to question whether the resolution approved at the June 22 council meeting authorizes the City to issue NAGC an annual mining permit. Sturgis-Babcock looked at minutes of the meeting, which she indicated were not yet complete, and said she would ask Angus what he had intended by the recommendations in his report.

Sturgis-Babcock confirmed per minutes of the meeting that the council had approved attaching the four recommendations from Angus's report as an amendment to R-09-06-04 and had then approved the amended resolution. The council approved both the amendment and the resolution as amended by votes of 4 to 1. Stan Anderson, Jerald Brown, Mary Knodel and Randy Pomeranz voted yes; Jon Larson voted no. Councilman Neal Foster was absent from the meeting.

On July 13 Bahnke told the Nugget reporter she had not yet seen a signed copy of the resolution. She also noted that she and Mayor Denise Michels had left Nome shortly after the June 22 meeting ended and had returned more than a week later. The June 22 council meeting began at 6 p.m. instead of the regularly scheduled time of 7:30 p.m. because Bahnke and Michels needed to catch the evening flight out of Nome.

Bahnke said Councilman Andersen served as acting city manager in her absence and that Angus had informed Andersen that Rapose had brought the Moonlight Wells mining site into compliance per the amended resolution.

The signed copy of Resolution R-

09-06-04 that Bahnke provided to the Nugget reporter July 20 includes the statement: "APPROVED and SIGNED this 22 day of June, 2009." The resolution is signed by Michels and attested by Sturgis-Babcock.

Spirit of Oceanus pays Nome a visit

Cruise ship provides amenities for adventurous passengers

By Anna Hahn

The Spirit of Oceanus docked in Nome for a brief stopover on Friday morning.

The ship carried about 115 guests and 34-40 crewmembers on the Nome portion of its tour. The 300-foot ship is 8 years old and is the only foreign-flagged vessel under the only American-owned cruise ship line, Cruise West.

The advantage to traveling under a foreign flag on this boat allows it more trouble-free travels to other countries compared to an American-flagged ship.

"Most of our guests are extremely well traveled, retired folks looking for a unique, uncrowded, casual and personal experience," said John Kreilcamp, the vice-president of Alaska Operations for Cruise West, based out of Anchorage.

Life on a ship is extremely different than on solid ground. However, the boat does provide many similar services and conveniences found on land.

The medical facilities hold a minimal amount of technology, but include defibrillators, oxygen, supplies for stitches and simple fractures, and facilities to hold seriously ill people until they are on shore and able to reach a hospital.

The dining room is outfitted in a formal style where wines are priced around $50 and sparkling wines work their way up to $105 a bottle. Breakfast is most commonly served on the deck, where there is a large hot tub. The crew also pumps the tub with plain chilling seawater to allow guests the ultimate opportunity of a "polar bear swim."

A small weight room is located a short way down the shinning, faux-wood-lined and video-camera-monitored hall.

Guest bedrooms range from 215 square feet (the smallest room, a "Superior Suite") to 437 square feet (the Owner's Suite). All hold life-jackets, a private bathroom, TV, and the bed converts from two twins into a king-sized bed.

While many cruises include gambling and games, this experience provides guests with guest speakers for entertainment. Lectures with topics based around wildlife, culture and Alaska are not uncommon.

Most of the crew originate from outside the United States. However, all labor laws must follow those of the United States, and every crewmember knows English.

The Spirit of Oceanus often stops in Nome, but this time will not return for two years. It will be traveling around the world on a international cruise where guests may join the adventure from almost any land stopover on its itinerary.

BON VOYAGE—Passengers step aboard the Spirit of Oceanus as it prepares to depart Nome July 17. Several Nomeites were involved in providing a brief tour of the town for the visiting passengers.

• Roads

portation," she said.

Baltar advised the community to consider banding with City of Nome to improve city streets that everyone uses. These are:

- Renewed surfaces for Third, Fourth and Fifth avenues between Steadman and "K" streets.
- Improvements to Bering Street from Front Street to Bypass Road.
- Pavement for Bypass Road.

That idea went over like a lead umiaq.

Nuh-uh, said Frank Irelan, also a member of the IRA Council. Throwing in with the City would mean that people already getting paychecks from the City would get the project pay.

"It would give money to people who already have jobs—money for people already hired," Irelan said. "A coastal ferry would give jobs to King Island people who need jobs."

Later in the meeting, Irelan suggested that a trail-marking project could start soon and provide jobs.

Other members suggested they could go for dust control on the City's streets.

"We need dust control for where we live for our quality of life," said IRA Council Member Ruth Ojanen, encouraging more input from King Island members. "Your comments are helpful. Every comment is valuable."

All in all, the King Island group came up with the following wish list for further consideration:

- Improve Cape Woolley Road and make it safer.
- Establish a ferry across Cape Woolley Lagoon, but restrict access to King Island lands on the other side.

- Dust control on Nome Council Road to Milepost 18 or 20.

- Dust control and improvements of Dexter Bypass and Nome-Taylor Highway as far as Kuzitrin area for subsistence access.

- Improvement on Blodgett Highway (Nome-Teller Road) to Milepost 40 where Cape Woolley Road heads toward the coast.

- Transit bus for Nome, including wheelchair access. Such a plan could be subsidized by the state with vouchers, Ellanna said. She had met with state officials to begin to explore the plan.

- Winter trail marking Nome to Teller and to Cape Woolley.

- New road from Tisuk River to Sinuk River.

- Shelter cabins with emergency supplies.

- Safety classes for country travelers.

- Research for a coastal ferry system.

- Spring snow removal on Teller and Cape Woolley roads.

- Helicopter landing pad at the coastline of King Island combined with a seasonal dock. Currently, helicopters land at top of King Island, but that necessitates a difficult job carrying supplies down to the village, Vince Pikonganna observed.

- Investigating a tramway from the boat landing to the village—good for elders.

Would this mean the people want public access on King Island? Baltar asked.

"It would be better to have a public building and guides," Frank Irelan said. "That would be jobs and protect our lands."

fishing for chum salmon is closed by regulation.

Record low chum counts through July 15 at the Kwiniuk River Tower in the Moses Point (Elim) subdistrict and the Niukluk river Tower in the Golovin subdistrict prevented ADF&G from opening a commercial chum fishery in the subdistricts this year.

"By Board of Fisheries regulation, the Subdistrict 2 (Golovin Bay) and Subdistrict 3 (Moses Point) Salmon Management Plan does not allow for a commercial chum fishery unless the department projects that chum salmon escapement goals will be achieved and the harvestable surplus will more than meet escapement needs," Menard explained in an e-mail to The Nome Nugget July 19. "A commercial pink salmon fishery may not occur unless subsistence needs are expected to be met and the chum salmon escapement goals achieved."

"The above regulation will keep the commercial fishermen on the beach in Elim and Golovin until coho [silver salmon] season," he added. "In the Subdistrict 2 and 3 management plan the commercial coho fishery may occur when the chum salmon escapement goals are achieved or when the department determines that further restrictions would have no impact on achieving chum salmon escapement goals."

On July 17 the ADF&G closed all salmon net fishing on the Pilgrim and Kuzitrin rivers because only 255 sockeye salmon had passed through the Pilgrim River weir through July 14. The Pilgrim River is a tributary of the Kuzitrin. Nearly 8,000 sockeyes had passed through the weir on July 14 last year, the second lowest sockeye count for that day since the weir began operating in 2003.

Hook and line is the only legal subsistence gear to harvest salmon in the Pilgrim and Kuzitrin rivers. Sport fish bag limits are in effect for subsistence hook and line fishing. The escapement goal at Salmon Lake ranges from 4,000 to 8,000 sockeyes observed by aerial survey. Subsistence fishers are reminded that Salmon Lake remains closed to salmon fishing by regulation.

Menard provided the following mid-July reports on salmon runs and salmon fisheries in all six subdistricts in Norton Sound. Cumulative figures for salmon species enumerated at counting projects through July 19 appear at the end of the report.

Unalakleet Subdistrict

Commercial fishing for chum salmon (mesh restricted to 6 inches or less) began July 10. Preliminary commercial catches through mid-July were 4,927 chums, 8,544 pinks, 81 silvers and 36 sockeyes for 15 permit holders.

Subsistence gillnet fishing with unrestricted mesh is open seven days a week in the marine waters and downstream of the confluence of the North River. Subsistence beach seining is open seven days a week in the marine and fresh waters of the subdistrict. All king salmon caught in beach seines must be immediately returned to the water. Sport fishing remains closed to king salmon in the subdistrict and no bait can be used.

Catches through July 15 at the Unalakleet River Test Fish project totaled 132 kings, 737 chums, 175 pinks and six sockeyes.

With the subsistence closures in recent years the test catches can be somewhat skewed when compared historically. However, this year we started commercial fishing much earlier in the season in the subdistrict, believing that we would still reach the king salmon escapement goal with the mesh restrictions in the commercial fishery limiting the king catch in the commercial catch.

The test net king catch through July 15 is the best catch since 1997. We usually have passed the 90 percent point of king run at the test net by July 15. The chum catch through July 15 is average when compared to the five-year average and one-third above the 10-year average. The average historical midpoint at the test net is July 15.

The pink catch through July 15 is double most odd-numbered years in the 1990s and 2001. In 2003 and 2005 huge odd-numbered year runs had test net catches 10 times higher for mid-July. The 2007 catches were almost double the 2009 catches for mid-July. The average first quarter point for an odd-numbered year at the test net is July 15.

The Unalakleet River Test Fish project is conducted by ADF&G with assistance from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. (NSED).

Escapement goals at the North River Tower are: King salmon 1,200 to 2,600; chum, no goal established; pink, 25,000; silver, 550 to 1,100 (aerial survey goal). Cumulative counts through July 15 were 1,260 kings, 2,184 chums, 38,154 pinks, 12 silvers and 16 sockeyes.

We made the low end of the king goal because of a big two-day push at the tower on July 12 (336 kings) and July 13 (312 kings). Twenty-four kings passed the tower on July 14 and 36 kings on July 15. In the period from 2004 through 2008 we made escapement only in 2007 with 1,948 kings counted at the tower. Through July 19 a total of 1,770 kings had passed the North River Tower, nearly double the final escapement count of 900 kings last year. The average historical third quarter point is July 15.

The chum count is about two-thirds of the five-year average and about 15 percent below the 10-year average. The North River tower is not a good indicator of chum run strength, as radio telemetry studies have shown that about 15 percent of the chum run to the Unalakleet River goes up the North River. The average historical midpoint is July 21.

The pink salmon run is coming in as expected with escapement to date well below recent odd-numbered years of 2003, 2005 and 2007 and well above the 1997, 1999 and 2001 runs. The average historical first quarter point is July 14 for an odd-numbered year.

Silvers are starting to be counted at the tower about one week later than in recent years. The average historical first quarter point at the tower is Aug. 2. The North River tower is a cooperative project of ADF&G and NSED.

Shaktoolik Subdistrict

Commercial fishing for chum salmon (mesh restricted to 6 inches or less) began July 10. Preliminary commercial catches to date are 5,172 chums, 4,359 pinks, 70 silvers for 11 permit holders.

Subsistence gillnet fishing with unrestricted mesh is open seven days a week in the marine and fresh waters. Subsistence beach seining is open seven days a week in the marine and fresh waters. All king salmon caught in beach seines must be immediately returned to the water. Sport fishing remains closed to king salmon in the subdistrict and no bait can be used.

Norton Bay Subdistrict

Commercial fishing for chum salmon (mesh restricted to 6 inches or less) began July 14. Commercial catches to date are confidential because fewer than four permit holders have fished.

Moses Point (Elim) Subdistrict

Escapement goals at the Kwiniuk River Tower are: King salmon, 300 to 550; chum, 11,500 to 23,000; pink, 8,400; silver, 650 to 1,300 (aerial survey goal). Cumulative counts through July 15 were 279 kings, 5,940 chums and 9,807 pinks.

The average historical third quarter point for kings is July 15. The kings have been tracking the five- and 10-year averages and are on track to pass the low end of the escapement goal for the first time since 2005.

By July 15 at the tower we are usually at the 80 percent point for the chums. Looking back 30 years, we are at least at the 70 percent point of the chum run past the tower. Using 70 percent at the tower this year, we would project the chum count at the tower finishing at the all time lowest since operations began in 1965. The lowest count was 1976 when 8,508 chums were counted for the season, and the second lowest count was 1999 when 8,763 chums were counted for the season.

The average historical first quarter point for pinks is July 17 for an odd-numbered year. The pink count ranks 4th in the last 10 odd-numbered years. In 2005 there were more than 58,000 pinks past the tower by this date, but we are well within striking distance of the second biggest count in recent odd-numbered years of 12,678 pinks past the tower in 2007 by July 15. The counts in 1997, 1999 and 2001 were all fewer than 1,000 by this date. The Kwiniuk River Tower is an ADF&G project with assistance from NSEDC.

Golovin Subdistrict

Escapement goals at the Niukluk River Tower are: Pink salmon, 10,500; chum, minimum of 30,000; king, minimum of 100 (combined Fish River and Boston Creek aerial survey); silver 2,400 - 6,100. Cumulative counts through July 15 were 168 kings, 5,275 chums and 8,754 pinks.

The average historical third quarter point for kings is July 14. This is the best king count since 2002 and the first time we have cracked 100 kings since 2004. The average historical midpoint for chums is July 14. This is the worst count by this date since the project began in 1995.

This the eighth odd-numbered year of counting pinks, and we rank third for this date behind 2005 (34,000) and 2007 (17,500), but well ahead of the fewer than 1,000 counted in 1997, 1999 and 2001 by this date. The average historical first quarter point for the tower in an odd-numbered year is July 20. The Niukluk river Tower is an ADF&G project with assistance from NSEDC.

Nome Subdistrict

As noted above, all salmon net fishing and chum salmon fishing are closed in the subdistrict. The only legal subsistence gear for salmon fishing is hook and line. Any chum salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released while in the water. Sport fishing for chum salmon is closed by regulation.

The Eldorado River Weir escapement goal is 6,000 to 9,200 chum salmon. Cumulative counts through July 15 were four kings, 1,759 chums and 94 pinks. The chum count is the second lowest on record for this date. The average historical third quarter point at the weir is July 18.

The pink count is average for this date. In most odd-numbered years, fewer than 1,000 pinks are counted past the weir. In 2007 there were 283 pinks counted past the weir by July 15, and the final count of the season was 833 pinks. In 2005 there were 103 pinks counted past the weir by July 15, but the final count was a record odd-numbered year count of 12,356 pinks. The average historical first quarter point at the weir is July 21. The Eldorado River Weir is a cooperative project between NSEDC and ADF&G.

Escapement goals at the Nome River weir are: Chum 2,900 to 4,300; pink, 3,150 (odd-numbered year). Cumulative counts through July 15 are 107 chums, 121 pinks and one sockeye.

The average historical first quarter point for chums is July 12 and the midpoint is July 19. Chum passage at the weir is a record low for this date. Pink passage ranks fourth out of eight odd-numbered years, well behind the record odd-numbered year of 2005 that had 16,508 pinks by this date and the second best count of 2007 (3,328) by this date.

Historically we are at the average 2 percent cumulative passage through the weir by July 15 with the average historical first quarter point for an odd-numbered year occurring on July 22. The Nome River Weir is an ADF&G project with assistance from NSEDC.

The Snake River Weir escapement goal is 1,600 to 2,500 chum salmon. Cumulative counts through July 15 were 60 chums and 21 pinks.

The average historical first-quarter point for chums is July 14. Only two years (1999 and 2007) had lower counts through July 15. The final count in 1999 was 484 chums, and in 2007 it was 1,224 chums.

The average historical first quarter point for pinks in an odd-numbered year is July 23. By July 15 pinks were at the average 1 percent of passage. In 2007 there were 161 pinks past the weir by July 15 with a final count of 4,634 pinks, and in 2005 there were 175 pinks past the tower by July 15 with a final count of 13,813 pinks. The weir is a cooperative project of NSEDC and ADF&G.

The Glacial Lake Weir escapement goal (aerial survey) is 800 to 1,600 sockeye salmon. The cumulative count through July 15 was 607 sockeyes, the lowest since complete season counts began in 2001. The average historical third quarter point is July 13. The weir is a cooperative project between and NSEDC and ADF&G.

Port Clarence District

As noted above, all salmon net fishing was closed on the Pilgrim and Kuzitrin Rivers effective July 17. Hook and line is the only legal subsistence gear to harvest salmon in the Pilgrim and Kuzitrin Rivers. Sport fish bag limits are in effect for subsistence hook and line fishing.

The Pilgrim River Weir escapement goal (aerial survey at Salmon Lake and Grand Central tributary to Salmon Lake) is 4,000 to 8,000 sockeye salmon. Cumulative counts through July 15 were 11 kings, 318 chums, 36 pinks and 262 sockeyes. All counts are the lowest since the weir began operations in 2003.

The average historical midpoint for sockeye salmon is July 15. The next lowest count at the weir through July 15 was 2008 with 8,702 sockeyes counted. The average historical first quarter point for chums is July 18. The average historical first quarter point for pinks for an odd-numbered year is July 17. The weir is a cooperative project of NSEDC and ADF&G.

Salmon counts through July 19

Cumulative figures for salmon species enumerated at counting projects through July 19 are as follows: Unalakleet Test Net: 134 kings, 820 chums, 380 pinks, one coho; North River: 1,770 kings, 3,318 chums, 67,302 pinks, 402 cohos; Kwiniuk River: 342 kings, 7,023 chums, 18,342 pinks, six cohos; Niukluk River: 174 kings, 9,138 chums, 10,023 pinks, three cohos; Eldorado River: seven kings, 3,188 chums, 238 pinks; Nome River: 350 chums, 738 pinks; Snake River: 288 chums, 96 pinks; Pilgrim River: 19 kings, 767 chums, 103 pinks, 375 sockeyes; and Glacial Lake: 726 sockeyes.

For more information, contact Menard or Scott Kent, assistant area management biologist, ADF&G Nome Area Office, phone (907) 443-5167.

Kotzebue District

The Kotzebue Sound commercial salmon fishery opened July 10 after Great Pacific Seafoods registered to buy salmon. Preliminary commercial catches through July 16 were 14,140 chums for 23 permit holders. Catches and catches per unit of effort were average for the first week of fishing.

The ADF&G began operating the Kobuk River Test Fish project July 10. The catch through July 15 was 36 chums and 150 sheefish. The cumulative chum index was 36.7 points and average for July 15. The cumulative sheefish index of 170.9 points was slightly below average for July 15.

For more information, call the Kotzebue ADF&G office at 442-3420, the ADF&G Commercial Fisheries office in Nome at 1-800-560-2271 or the buyer at 442-4192.

Norton Sound red king crab

Through July 20 approximately 112,199 pounds of crab had been harvested in the Norton Sound red king crab commercial open-access fishery, including 25,154 pounds of crab in the Community Development Quota fishery. Almost 260,000 pounds remain of the open-access quota. Twenty-three vessels are registered in the fishery.

NEC Cultural Camp teaches youth traditional living

By Kirsten Timbers

Nome Eskimo Community sponsored its third annual Summer Youth Cultural Camp July 6-10. The camp was hosted by Tom and Bee Jay Gray of Alaskan Northwest Adventures at their campsite, the "Mosquito Bar" on the Niukluk River. Twelve joyful 7-12th grade campers attended. They were Katelynn Avesuk, Lindsay Burt, Jacqueline Gallineaux, Katelynn Gray, Shayla Johnson, Dezireae Sherman-Kakaruk, Deanna Walluk, Elizabeth White, Samuel Ahkinga, Jason Gilder, Clifford Iknokinok, and Taylor McDaniel. This year's camp had a strong focus on traditional living and fishing. "From river to land, it's cut and canned" was the theme.

The campers were accompanied by four chaperones: Naomi Brunette, Kirsten Timbers, Fawn White and Jeff Collins. Chaperones were provided by Bering Straits Foundation, Nome Community Center and NEC. The staff and campers had a wonderful time filled with exciting and informative presentations, fishing, swimming, eco challenges and great food which was graciously prepared by Bee Jay and Crystal Lincoln. This year's camp was organized by Katie O'Connor, Tribal Services coordinator for Nome Eskimo Community.

On the first day of camp all the youth gathered at Nome Eskimo Community and prepared for the ride out to Council. Lance Johnson, Nome Community Center, and Dawn Warnke, NEC Tribal Services Specialist, drove two vans filled with eager campers. The drive took about 2.5 hours to get to Council where they were met by Tom and his river guide, Edward Stang. After their arrival the staff, chaperones and campers helped load the boats with their camping gear and shortly thereafter were on their way down the Niukluk River to the Mosquito Bar campsite. After going over camp instructions and camper expectations, campers ate a quick lunch and boated down the mouth of the Niukluk and Fish rivers to seine. Seining was a huge success as the campers pulled in 13 kings (12 in one seine) and several chums. Upon return to camp Tom gave a fish cutting demonstration to the campers and then handed them all traditional Fish River style ulus to allow them to practice cutting their own fish. The campers all cut fish and hung it on the dry rack. The rest of the evening followed with dinner, ice breakers, S'mores and ghost stories before bedtime.

The next day the campers were greeted by a beautiful blue sky and bright sunshine. After a hearty breakfast the campers began smoking the fish and cleaning off any maggots that had been laid in the cache overnight. The campers had their first guest presenter, Stephanie Johnson from the Nome Youth Facility, who focused on Drug Demand Reduction. The campers participated in a balloon game that taught the importance of having values. They also did an exercise using cookies that taught them about peer pressure. It was a very informative presentation and the children took away great lessons.

The second guest speaker was Rahnna Parker from the Norton Sound Health Corporations CAMP department who focused on diabetes prevention. She did an exercise with the students that taught them about how the body produces insulin. Rahnna also discussed how the Bering Strait region has the highest rate of diabetes in the nation. She had a huge can of soda and can of chew and used them as tools to discuss how soda and tobacco, when used at the same time, can be dangerous for one's health and can put one at risk for diabetes.

The campers wound down the busy day with games indoors and stories around the campfire.

On the third day the campers put all their energy into seining. Each child was given a specific task and they set and pulled in the seine net all by themselves. They caught as many fish as was needed and even caught enough to share 63 chums and 4 kings with neighboring camps.

After seining, the campers were given a lesson on canning fish from Tom Gray. While half of the students canned fish the other half swam and tried their luck with a rod and reel.

The campers then prepared for the acclaimed Eco Challenge. The campers and counselors were divided into four teams for the Eco Challenge; Team Coho, Team King, Team Sockeye and the counselors were Team Mulukchuks. The goal was to be the first team to swim across the river and back, make a fire, and get a pot of water to a rolling boil. The teams consisted of five teammates: two canoers, one runner, one swimmer, and one fire starter. The canoers started the race carrying with them five Strike-Anywhere matches in a Ziploc bag. They paddled ferociously upstream about 200 yards. There they handed the matches to the runner, who ran to the end of the gravel bar and back. The runner gave the matches to the swimmer who swam back to the beginning of the race, where the fire starter had been busy gathering wood. All teammates worked together to get any other dry wood they could find to help bring the water to a rolling boil. The campers worked hard and cooperatively. It was exciting and a memorable race for all.

The chaperones thought that the campers would be tucked out from working in the water all day, but somehow everyone managed to stay up way past bed time to play numerous enthusiastic games of Spoons and Scatergories.

The next day campers awakened to fog and drizzle. Though it was damp outside, it did not dampen anyone's spirits. The schedule included a hike, rain or shine, with guide and GPS instructor Keith Conger. The campers loaded into two boats and rode up the Fish River to Aggie Creek. Keith gave a tutorial to the campers about how to use a GPS and made coordinates of checkpoints along the hike. The campers hiked into Aggie Creek and visited the old mining buildings and a dilapidated dredge. As soon as the crew got to the dredge the sun broke through the clouds and stayed for the reminder of the day. Many campers had rosy cheeks and tanned arms after the hike.

The crew returned to camp and had a delicious dinner of traditional Eskimo food. The children were well fed and delighted that the counselors were on dish duty. The evening consisted of canning fish, swimming and numerous magic card tricks.

The final day was met with long faces and talk about next year's camp. The campers and chaperones broke camp and prepared to leave. The kids piled their gear into the boats and headed back to Council where Colin Long, NEC Capacity Building Project Coordinator and Fawn White were waiting to hear about the week's adventures. After a few last minute pictures and good-byes, the kids and gear made their way back home.

Young bookworms hit the library

By Anna Hahn

Every child of Nome has heard of (and most likely participated in) the Summer Reading Program the Kegoayah Kozga library annually hosts.

"I heard about the program when we moved here. We came one time and were hooked. We've been coming ever since," said Jennifer Goslin, the mother of four young boys.

This year's theme for the program is "Get Creative at Your Library." With this, Nome's local library has created a variety of crafts with their older group including jellyfish, Eskimo masks, comics on computers, flags, coats of arms and crowns. They also have learned about the health of the ocean with the crew from the sail boat Ocean Watch.

In a separate session for preschoolers, Marguerite La Riviere, the library director, reads a story aloud, provides coloring sheets, simple projects and bookmark crafts, and makes puzzles available.

"It's an important time for the toddlers, I put the puzzles out for the younger kids because they need to learn basic shapes and letters in order for them to be able to read later on. For example, a triangle kind of looks like an A, they need to be able to learn and understand that" said La Riviere.

When a child first enrolls with the program he or she receive a bag full of logos and stickers to keep track of reading minutes and the number of books they've read.

Each adolescent picks and sets personal reading goals.

This year there are more than 100 participants in the program (compared to the 63 young readers from last summer). At one point this summer the library was jammed with 22 kids and their parents.

The program runs for an entire two months and is sponsored by the Alaska State Library. They pick the theme's direction for the state and send goodies, crafts and more ideas out to individual libraries.

"For me, I think it's really important for the library to have the reading program. The doors are closed to the general public so the kids can run around and be a little louder," said La Riviere.

Police arrest one, seek another in Nome Trading Co. burglary

By Tyler Rhodes

The Nome Police Department has arrested a man they allege was part of a break-in and burglary over the weekend at the Nome Trading Company.

Michael Wayne Bowman, 18, was charged with second-degree burglary, second-degree theft and third-degree criminal mischief. According to police, Bowman moved to Nome from California last fall. The police believe Bowman did not act alone and are trying to identify and locate an accomplice.

Police say the robbery likely took place sometime between 2:30 a.m. and 5:30 a.m. Saturday. Stolen were a 42-inch and three other flat-screen LCD televisions. Police believe the thieves also helped themselves to soda, candy and beef jerky. The thieves gained entry to the store through a front window causing an estimated $1,000 in damage. Police received the report of the burglary just before 6 a.m. Saturday.

Police arrested Bowman Sunday evening after executing a search warrant at his home where they said the four televisions were found.

In a short appearance Monday for his arraignment in District Court before Judge Ben Esch, Bowman entered a plea of not guilty. Bowman, who told Esch he was currently employed and had been working for Arctic Transportation Services for the past nine months, was granted a public defender.

Esch ordered Bowman be held in lieu of $2,500 bail and the requirement he be watched by a third-party custodian if released. A preliminary hearing in the matter is scheduled for July 30.

Police are still seeking the public's help in locating the other suspect. They ask that anyone with information call the department at 443-5262 any time, day or night.

Saying it Sincerely

By Rev. Julie Yoder Elmore, Community United Methodist Church
For the Nome Ministerial Association
Biblical Reference - Amos 7:7-15

This Bible passage begins with God showing Amos a plumb line against a wall built with a plumb line. In construction, a plumb line is used to measure something against the ideal or standard. God is setting a plumb line in the midst of God's people — Israel. Today we can look to Christ as an ideal or standard for us in our lives — our plumb line for today. When God sent Jesus Christ into the world, Jesus set the example by which we should live. While Jesus was on the earth, he built relationships with people and especially made sure that those who were outcast by society were seen and heard by him. In Luke 19, when Jesus saw Zacchaeus up in the sycamore tree, Jesus asked him to come down and said that he needed to stay at Zacchaeus' house. Who would stay with someone who was so hated and ostracized for cheating people? According to Luke 19, Jesus would.

Jesus also overturned the tables of the moneychangers. He overturned the tables of people selling things in the temple for their own benefit. The vendors were cheating people. Jesus also healed the most affluent, important people in society as well as the poorest. We see this when Jesus healed both Jairus' daughter and the woman who had been bleeding for 12 years. Both were female and at opposite ends of the class and economic spectrum.

Amos 7:7-15, Amos was calling people on behalf of God to live according to the plumb line God set for all people. Many in power did not like this because the powerful gained from the injustices or did not want to do the work required to live as God called them to do.

Prophets really have a great challenge. First of all they are called by God to deliver a certain message to a certain people in a certain place. Some people try to make excuses as to why they cannot be a prophet. God does, however, equip the called. Second of all, prophets are most often called to speak in a place where the people do not want to hear the message — especially if that message from God means that they have to change their behavior. The one bearing the message is not often welcome. Amos seemed to run into this challenge.

Yes, Amos was being sent away by the Priest Amaziah at Bethel who told the king that Amos was conspiring against him. Amaziah did not want to hear Amos' message from God and was trying to send him back to where he came from. Amaziah did not want anyone else prophesying to the people at Bethel, which ironically means "House of God." Amos was being silenced.

Who in our world is silenced today? Whose words do we need to hear that we would rather not? Could God be trying to communicate to us through them?

Accused killer of Julie Vacek Farewell may stand trial in California

By Sandra L. Medearis

A man accused of killing former Nomeite Julie Vacek has asked for a sanity hearing, scheduled in California's Solano County next week.

Standing accused of the December 2007 domestic violence homicide after which police found Julianna Farewell dead in the couple's apartment is her husband of five years, Peter William Farewell, then 42. She was 49.

Capt. Mike Daley of the Benicia, Calif. Police Department said Monday there has been no trial in the case opened in 2007, pending a hearing to determine Farewell's competency to stand trial.

Investigators believe Farewell struck his wife in the head with an unidentified object, Daley said earlier.

Police responded to a medical emergency call at the Farewell residence in the 1100 block of East 6th Street at about suppertime on Dec. 17, 2007, according to police documents.

Farewell told dispatchers during a 911 call there had been a medical emergency and he was performing CPR on his girlfriend, and then hung up without providing added details, Daley said.

Benicia Fire Department paramedics discovered Julianna Farewell expired at the residence. The Farewells had lived in Benicia for five years. The Benicia Police Department said neither party had a were told that only biodegradable bags were to be used— if any at all— because plastic bags would clog up the system and fill the lagoon up very fast. The system was meant to be a leachable and would last a long time if handled right.

Now, I was told (with some very harsh words from our mayor) that this was not a leach system because that would be a contamination of the tundra. So we were all to use plastic bags to hold our waste and that would make it cleaner for the workers. This now leaves us with a sewage lagoon that is full of plastic bags filled with waste.

The solution for cleaning up this problem has now been made and it is a winner. A new lagoon will be made! And so when it is filled up with plastic bags I guess another one will be built.

Wales will be the city best known for all the sewage lagoons dotting the area. What a beautiful sight that will be. It falls right in line with the City dump that covers almost a mile of beach.

But that has a solution as well.,

New very small equipment was bought and shipped to Wales. This equipment will be used to clean up the dump, and the operators, who have absolutely no experience, are the sons of the mayor. I guess the City’s Insurance Company will have no problems with this as well.

Now to keep us all from asking questions on any of this, meetings are held in secret and no room is provided for the public even if they knew of them. No minutes are posted anywhere for the public to read and when I asked about it I was told to write a letter and I would get a response.

I was at one time under the impression that all City papers and business were public knowledge, but how can that be when the office is not willing to post anything for the public to know? And people are told that they cannot look at them. The mayor bad-mouths any questions and purposefully pulls work away from people who can do it and gives it to his inexperienced family.

Yes, a town overflowing with waste!

All the volunteers who worked so hard to make last weekend’s WOT clinics a success.

The volunteers arrived early to set up the fire hall classroom, made coffee, ran errands, picked up meals, set up the range and spent hours on their knees in the gravel to run the manual clay throwers. They were cheerful, positive and focused. After the weekend was done, they cleaned it all up, and talked about the next event. What a wonderful group! Sincere thanks go to:

Howard Appel, Brian Hensley, Kevin Knowlton – who volunteered both days; John Mikulski – our photographer extraordinaire; Dan Reed – who came to observe, and ended up coaching all day; Jeff Darling, Brad Dittmar, Bantu Nichols – some of the best volunteers ever; Bruce Klein and Laurie Harlan – Nome Sportsmen’s Association Board members; AND Steve Smith – without Steve, none of this would have happened.

530 to 700 gallons per minute. Additionally, the plan called for the injection wells to be able to handle up to 150 percent of the treatment plant's capacity. "Instead, Rock Creek did not inject ... water until May 15, 2009 when they requested and received Department-required approval to inject," the notice reads.

NovaGold reported receiving the violation in a July 15 press release announcing its second quarter financial results for 2009.

Van Nieuwenhuyse said the notice was unexpected. "We were a bit surprised on the notice of violation because the water treatment plant has been operational since February as well as the injection field," he said July 16.

Van Nieuwenhuyse admits that the system was not operating at full-scale in February, citing problems with freezing pipes and other winterization issues. "It's kind of almost like ... when you're starting to prime something, you kind of have to take several times to get it right," he said.

While working out the kinks in the system, Van Nieuwenhuyse said the water running through the treatment plant was eventually being circuited back to the tailings storage facility. Once the injection wells were engaged in mid May, NovaGold started gradually ramping up the rate at which the water was pumped underground. According to the DEC, the average injection rate was 150 gallons per minute from May 15 to June 15. The DEC said a rate of 300 gallons per minute was achieved on June 26, and 330 gallons was hit on July 1.

Van Nieuwenhuyse said July 16 that the injection rate was averaging around 350 to 360 gallons per minute. He said the water level of the pond behind the dam is now lowering at a rate of a little more than an inch a day. "The immediate thing we want to do is get the water from behind the dam," Van Nieuwenhuyse said. "As we have said many times, the water was never intended to be there."

The tailings impoundment has been collecting water from runoff, precipitation and groundwater. A small amount of water used in the mine's short production run was also deposited in the pond. Both DEC and NovaGold officials say that water is no longer in the system. "It's not process water, that's been long gone," Stambaugh said.

"The important thing is it's just water," Van Nieuwenhuyse said. "You could literally classify it as storm water."

In its notice of violation, the DEC asks that NovaGold present an engineered plan by July 15 detailing how it will process the approximate 50 million gallons of water that could have been treated and removed if the system would have been operational along the timeline spelled out in the permit. At a steady rate of 300 gallons per minute, 24 hours a day, it would take nearly four months to process 50 million gallons. Early in the year, the water was estimated at a volume of 54 million gallons.

The DEC's Stambaugh acknowledged that NovaGold had achieved a rate of at least 300 gallons per minute, but she noted that is about 50 percent shy of the rate DEC wanted to see processed. "They needed to inject more than that to start reducing the water behind the tailings storage facility," Stambaugh said.

requirements the same way, saying the permit required a rate of 330 gallons per minute. "Read the permit. It's online," he said.

Discrepancies over the required rate aside, Van Nieuwenhuyse said his goal is to have the pond essentially drained by the end of the year. "My objective is to try and get rid of all the water this year—or at least the lion's share, because you'll never get rid of it all," he said.

Stambaugh said July 16 that NovaGold did submit to DEC a plan to address the violation by the July 15 deadline. "They were responsive to get materials to us by deadline," she said.

She withheld any comment on the plan since department staff were just starting to review it.

Chris Foley, the program manager for the Division of Water's Compliance Program, said that while there is no statutory time limit for DEC to make a determination on NovaGold's plan, it is on the front burner. "It is a priority to us to evaluate that submission," he said.

The notice sent to NovaGold warns of potential fines and response costs—both in civil and criminal terms—associated with the violation. As of press time, the state had not filed any action in court against the company.

NovaGold reports narrowing its losses in second quarter

By Tyler Rhodes

Citing favorable exchange rates and reduced exploration costs, Rock Creek Mine operator NovaGold Resources reported a greatly reduced financial loss for the second quarter July 15 when compared to the same time period a year ago.

The Canadian mining firm, which is working toward becoming a production company, stated a net loss of $4.8 million Canadian for three-month quarter ending May 31. That compares to a second-quarter loss of C$23.2 million in 2008.

In announcing the financial results, NovaGold also said its two stalled projects, the Rock Creek Mine near Nome and Galore Creek in British Columbia, would see no new life for the rest of the year. NovaGold officials have repeatedly said Rock Creek would not re-open in 2009. In earlier reports the company said all options for Rock Creek are on the table, including rekindling the project, selling it or working it in collaboration with another firm. In its July 15 release, it said a review of whether or not to re-open the project is still pending.

With the two idled mines in what the company terms "care and maintenance" mode, NovaGold did not incur expense related to exploration at the projects. In the most recent quarter, the company reported expenditures of C$4.4 million related to exploration work at its Donlin Creek prospect near the Kuskokwim River. In the second quarter of 2008, NovaGold spent a combined C$16.9 million on exploration at Donlin, Rock Creek and Galore Creek.

The flip-side of the mines not producing is the obvious fact they are not turning a profit. With none of its properties producing minerals, NovaGold has primarily funded its activities through stock offerings. The company did report small revenues of approximately C$400,000 for the second quarter of 2009, mainly from land and gravel sales as well as gold royalties.

Exchange rates also smiled favorably upon NovaGold, playing a role in the C$18.4 million difference between the second quarters of 2008 and 2009. The company reported a C$16.1 million foreign exchange gain between the Canadian and U.S. dollars compared to a loss of C$700,000 in 2008. A strengthening Canadian dollar and its effect on the company's liabilities that are based in U.S. dollars was primarily credited for the gain.

NovaGold also reported on its financials for the first six months of the year, ending March 31. Over that period the company realized a net loss of C$33.3 million. That compares to net earnings over the same time period in 2008 of C$1 million.

In comparing the first six months of 2008 and 2009, NovaGold cited a C$16.3 million cost recovery by suspending Galore Creek in 2008. That suspension was also cited for cost increases in terms of care and maintenance costs, which along with Rock Creek, totaled C$15.5 million for first six months of 2009. In the 2008 time period, NovaGold spent only C$3.8 million for care and maintenance solely for Galore Creek. The company also cited interest payments and other debt expenses made in 2009 that added to the C$31.3 million jump in losses in 2009.

In addition to looking back on first half of 2009, the NovaGold release also commented on its outlook for the rest of the year. As of May 31, the company reported cash and cash equivalents of C$56.1 million with working capital of C$48.9 million.

For the remainder of the year, NovaGold said it will spend U.S.$7 million on the Donlin Creek project, mainly toward permitting. The company plans to spend the same amount toward maintaining Rock Creek while it decides what to do with the property. NovaGold plans to spend C$16 million for the maintenance and what it termed "optimization activities" at Galore Creek.

NovaGold also noted that no mineral production would occur at any of its properties in 2009. "The company does not plan to commence development or construction at its Donlin Creek and Galore Creek projects in 2009, nor does it currently plan to recommence the start-up process at the Rock Creek project," a July 15 press release reads.

For NovaGold to get any of those projects producing, significantly more money will be needed. "The company will need external financing to develop and construct its properties and to fund the exploration and development of its other mineral properties in future years," the release said. NovaGold said it could look to banks, debt and equity offerings for more cash.

Adopting the normal cautionary language used with financial resources, NovaGold warned additional cash might not be easy to come by. "There can be no assurance that the company will be able to secure the financing necessary to retain its rights to, or to begin or sustain production at, any of its mineral properties," the release concludes.

NovaGold President and Chief Executive Officer Rick Van Nieuwenhuyse said that search for funds would come a few years down the road as Donlin would near the end of its permitting stage. "We fully expect the permitting process to be a two- to three-year process," he said.

• Pipeline

back there unless you change the configuration [of the tailings storage facility]," Van Nieuwenhuyse said.

Nearly all of the water in the tailings facility is the result of runoff, groundwater and precipitation. The mine only worked its production cycle for a short amount of time last fall before shutting the facility down in November due to financial and mechanical issues.

Van Nieuwenhuyse said the pipe would run approximately eight or nine miles in length. He would not elaborate on any projected price tag for the proposal. "We're still working on a cost estimate," Van Nieuwenhuyse said. "We obviously have some ideas, [but] it's sensitive from a negotiating stand point. Obviously it's a long pipeline, so it's a significant number."

Nome Joint Utility System Manager John Handeland said the potential project would call for up to 250,000 gallons per day to be piped to Nome's sewer lagoons. He said that Nome currently puts approximately 450,000 gallons per day on average into the lagoons. He noted that the lagoons have the capacity to accept more than 1 million gallons a day and that no expansion would be required to accommodate the extra water.

Both Handeland and Van Nieuwenhuyse point out that the water coming from the mine to the lagoons would be far cleaner than what the city contributes. "Most of Nome's [input into the lagoon] is gray water-black water combination (sewage) that receives primary treatment by aeration in the lagoons. NovaGold's water would be good enough to drink," Handeland wrote in an e-mail to the Nugget.

Van Nieuwenhuyse believes the addition of the treated water from its plant would actually aid the city. "The benefit is the water quality is much better than sewage water," he said. "There's a dilutive benefit allowing Nome Joint Utility System to meet its water quality requirements."

Van Nieuwenhuyse added that a testing system would likely be put in place to evaluate the water between the plant and the lagoons. "We would have a third-party monitoring the water in the pipeline to ensure it does meet the delivery standards we have established," he said.

State regulators last week were getting their first peek at the proposal. "We got a verbal outline of it late Monday afternoon, [July 13]," said Sharon Stambaugh, a program manager within the Division of Water at the state Department of Environmental Conservation. "Both Nome Joint Utilities and the company came to us to talk about it. We didn't have a concrete plan. ... They were more advanced in proposing it than we were in reviewing it."

Police chief post offered to Trooper

John Papasodora currently commands the Alaska Bureau of Investigation

By Laurie McNicholas

The position of Nome Police Chief has been offered to John Papasodora, commander of the Alaska State Troopers Bureau of Investigation, announced City Manager Josie Bahnke at a Nome Common Council meeting Monday.

Papasodora currently administers a bureau of 43 personnel who conduct major felony investigations throughout the state. He previously served as AST emergency operations supervisor, administering statewide search and rescue, Homeland Security and Southcentral dispatch services; and as AST field operations coordinator, administering statewide training, tactical operations and all field training needs for the division.

In other business, only one of five resolutions approved by the council July 27 involved much discussion. It is entitled, "A resolution of appreciation to Eugene Asicksik in recognition of your unwavering support of the Nome harbor improvements projects and to the community of Nome."

The resolution notes that Asicksik established a successful working relationship between the City of Nome and Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. during his tenure as NSEDC's president and chief executive officer. Asicksik resigned from NSEDC in December 2007. Under his leadership, NSEDC contributed $3 million in matching funds for the

Concerns over mining creep into Council meeting

By Laurie McNicholas

Concerns about the potential impacts of local mining activities on drinking water quality, waste water disposal and sanitation received attention at a regular meeting of the Nome Common Council on Monday, although the topics were not agenda items.

In public comments during the meeting, Matt Ganley of Bering Straits Native Corp. noted that the state plans to open Nome's west beach to public mining. He said that BSNC as an adjacent landowner would like the City to be proactive in posting information about human waste and trash on the west beach early in the process.

Sue Steinacher expressed concern about permit violations involving contaminants at the mine site operated by Marvin Rapose in the Moonlight Wells Protection Area from which Nome draws its drinking water. The City issued an annual mining permit to Rapose, dba Nome AK Gold Concentrates (NAGC), on June 24 after he removed multiple permit violations from the mine site.

Steinacher said she respects the right of people to do as they please with their property, but if their activities lead to contaminants, then what they do is a concern to all. Noting that she and her husband are private property owners who have worked hard to pay off their mortgage, she said their investment would become worthless if Nome's drinking water is contaminated.

Steinacher cited a recent report about residents of a small West Virginia town with a long coal mining history who turned on their taps and found their drinking water irreversibly contaminated by coal slurry. Their property is worthless and their health is at risk, she noted, adding that their story had motivated her to express her concerns to the council.

"... I am not anti-mining, but state and federal regulations are there for a purpose," Steinacher said. She commended council members for their huge commitment of time and responsibility, but warned that if anything happens on their watch they will enter history books for reasons other than their service to the community. "When you are faced with difficult choices, take the long view and take all precautions to protect our drinking water," she urged.

Nearly all of Steinacher's comments were audible to the Nugget's reporter despite rattling metal noises made by Councilman Stan Andersen a few feet away as he rummaged in a file drawer adjacent to his seat at the council table. Andersen presided at the meeting in the absence of Mayor Denise Michels.

Crutch defends Rapose

Betty Crutch told the council she has visited the NAGC mining operation and has found no contamination there. She said she is next door to the NAGC site, meaning that her mine site is adjacent to it. "I think [Rapose] is running a clean operation, and I don't see it harming anyone," she said. "They also have a home in Icy View not far from Sue [Steinacher]."

Crutch said mining has been conducted at Moonlight Wells for going on 30 years and there has been no contamination. She said the public should be concerned about contamination, but [Dr. Derrick] Leedy has gone overboard. "Has anybody been by his business?" she asked. "I took pictures of it. Those who throw rocks should not live in glass houses." Crutch told the council that Leedy

Mother of killed ironworker files lawsuit

By Diana Haecker

Two years after two ironworkers crashed to their deaths due to an improperly set up manlift at the Rock Creek gold mine site—then under construction—the mother of one victim filed lawsuits at the Nome Superior Court last week.

The civil lawsuits target mine owner NovaGold Resources Inc., its subsidiary Alaska Gold Co., the lift manufacturer JLG, the company that sold and serviced the manlift, United Rentals, as well as Executive Force Australia Pty, an Australian-based company that was hired to develop and implement safety management systems for the mine, and Lexington Engineering and consultant Andrew Heycock.

Tyler Kahle, 19, of Tomahawk, Wis., and his 27-year-old colleague

Craig Bagley of Anchorage were at the end of their shift at the Rock Creek mine construction site on July 19, 2007 when the JLG manlift they were on toppled and catapulted the two men to the ground. Kahle and Bagley died shortly after the crash from blunt force trauma.

Michele Kahle, Tyler Kahle's mother, filed the lawsuits, claiming that the defendants breached their duty when "they failed to identify and rectify a dangerous situation concerning the position of the lift, use of the lift and task training of the operators" and for failing to comply with federal Mine Safety and Health Administration regulations concerning equipment maintenance, records, set-up, training and operations.

Letters

Dear Editor,

Your front page picture in the July 23 issue of the Nugget shows a group of smiling kids standing in the Niukluk River holding up ten dead king salmon for the camera. Imagine 12,000 copies of that picture; that’s the number of king salmon that were killed as bycatch and thrown over the side by the pollock trawlers in 2007. Shocking, isn’t it?

At a panel discussion during the Kawerak Regional Conference in March, NSEDC spokesperson Charlie Lean told the assembled that every man, woman and child in Norton Sound was a co-owner of factory trawlers through NSEDC’s investments in Glacier Fish Company. Personally, I’m not very comfortable in that role; in fact, I have been feeling awfully guilty about it.

Ten years ago, I was dismayed when the Alaska Supreme Court ruled in Native Village of Elim v. State of Alaska that it was OK for False Pass salmon fishermen to intercept Norton Sound chum salmon even though their interception contributed to disastrously weak chum returns to Norton Sound rivers. Despite decades of local harvesting restrictions, our chum salmon stocks never recovered and this summer’s return is the worst yet. In 2009, the intercept fisheries at False Pass took 706,850 chums; at least they didn’t waste them.

The king salmon bycatch in the pollock fishery has gotten most of the attention lately but in 2005, the pollock trawlers caught and wasted 700,000 chum salmon as bycatch. This time it is not some unknown pirates from down south taking the fish that people in western Alaska communities depend upon, it’s us and that bothers me.

I should know by now how these things work, but I was hopeful that the North Pacific Fisheries Management Council at their April meeting would take decisive action to protect our salmon populations. If the trends continue, some of them will go extinct.

In March, NSEDC told us at a public meeting in Nome that its Board of Directors had decided to recommend a 47,951 hard cap on king salmon bycatch. That would mean when that number was reached, pollock trawling would be shut down. I thought the proposed cap was too high. Kawerak, Nome Eskimo Community, Bering Sea Fishermen’s Association, AVCP, the Yukon River Drainage Fisheries Association and all of the other western Alaska organizations and individuals from the affected communities were calling for a hard cap of 30,000 or lower, but NSEDC was more concerned about the loss of profits for the trawlers if a lower cap was instituted than the economic and social impacts on the rural Alaska people who harvest salmon.

In April, I spent a week in Anchorage at the NPFMC meetings and listened to days of gut wrenching testimony about how the shortage of king salmon was hurting people in western Alaska and how badly people’s lives were being affected by it. I was particularly moved by the testimony of a woman from Old Crow, a Yukon River village in Canada telling the story about how her village shared one king salmon.

On the last day of testimony, I was sitting in the audience when the NSEDC staff made their recommendations. To my dismay, they did not advocate for the 47,951 hard cap they told us they were going to recommend. Instead, without telling anybody, they changed their position and went with the proposal favored by the Seattle based pollock industry. I was so surprised I had to ask someone else if they had heard the same thing I had heard. They confirmed it.

Eventually, the council settled on a 60,000 king salmon hard cap with something called an incentive plan that hadn’t even been developed yet that looks like a smoke screen for cheating on bycatch. I ran the numbers on historical harvests and if this plan had been in place during the past 12 years, it would have only reduced the king salmon bycatch from the 783,760 that were killed and wasted to 689,193. That’s not a very impressive reduction. Like False Pass before them, the big money trawl industry won out over the needy people in the villages. Only this time, sadly, our representatives stood on the side of the multinational giant corporations and against the local salmon fishermen.

My wife’s family is from the Yukon River. They are commercial and subsistence salmon fishermen. This winter the news media has carried numerous stories about how hard life has been following total closures of the king salmon commercial fisheries and restrictions on chum salmon commercial harvests and subsistence fishing. Ironically, the lower Yukon chum salmon commercial fisheries are being restricted by ADFG to minimize king salmon bycatch. I am having a hard time explaining to my family members and friends on the Yukon why we turned our backs on them in their time of need and why they have to be the ones carrying the entire burden of conservation. I don’t understand it either.

In 1998 when NSEDC went into debt to buy into Glacier Fish Company, one of my concerns was that someday we would be obligated to oppose the interests of rural Alaska fishermen, and I wrote about it in this newspaper. It looks like that day has arrived.

Theoretically, our GFC partnership made a lot of money, but did it really? The unresolved liability for previous years’ income taxes and the potentially massive bills for back taxes, penalties and interest and even worse, the risk of having the IRS revoke NSEDC’s tax exempt status puts the net profitability of this business venture in question. No one has been willing to tell me how much debt NSEDC took on last fall when they bought the Alaska Ocean, the largest trawler in US waters, but the rumors are that it was the highest price ever paid for pollock quota. I doubt that most of the NSEDC board members know either.

I plan to ask for an explanation from the NSEDC board at their meeting this week in Nome about why they reneged on what they told us they were going to do about king salmon bycatch. I can’t imagine what they could say that would convince me that killing and wasting hundreds of thousands of salmon is the right thing to do, but I look forward to hearing their rationale.

I also am going to ask about the debt and what they plan to do about the income tax liability hanging over our heads. I hope I get some answers and I encourage anyone who has additional questions to come to the meetings and try to get some answers.

Such a Deal

Cash for clunkers? The federal stimulus package to revive the auto industry encourages us to trade in our gas guzzling clunkers for super fuel efficient fancy new machines that are set to roll off the assembly lines in Detroit.

Nome has a gold mine in clunkers and junkers. Is there a fine line of distinction when a clunker becomes a junker? Is a junker a clunker without tires? Does a patch of fireweed growing in the engine block or a crop of stinkweed in the truck bed raise or lower the trade-in value? Do we have to keep the dogs that are chained to the fenders? Where do we take our trade in clunkers? Do we need to barge them to Kodiak, or do we need to designate a certified junkyard in Nome? Perhaps we could have several designated yards and we could just leave them where the are. I’ve looked at the lot behind my house and count three junkers, a possible clunker and overturned boat. Does the boat count?

We need to strike while the scrap iron is hot and load some of our retired vehicles onto a barge and send them south. Who knows? Maybe Cal Worthington or the Sales and Service guys could cut us a deal and give the city a break on some new trucks. Maybe an electric car? Nothing ventured; nothing gained. Keep smiling and thinking of those new wheels. —N.L.M.—

Benefits restored to Territorial Guard

The U.S. Senate last week restored military retirement benefits to 26 Alaska Territorial Guard members. In a vote of 87 to 7, the Senate adopted the ATG amendment into the $679.8 billion defense authorization bill for FY2010. The Department of Defense decided in January to discontinue retirement benefits to ATG members. The state bridged payments from April on.

Parnell sworn in as Alaska Governor

On Sunday, Sean Parnell was sworn in as Alaska's tenth governor before a crowd of more than 5,000 people during the Governor's Picnic in Fairbanks. Parnell succeeded Sarah Palin who resigned from the state's highest executive job with 17 months of the term still to go. Parnell told the crowd that he won't be constrained by a short-term vision, but instead would focus on Alaska's future for this generation and the next. Also present and sworn in as the temporary substitute lieutenant governor was Lt. General Craig Campbell, commissioner of the Alaska Department of Military and Veteran Affairs. Campbell still has to be approved by the State Legislature during a special session on August 10. Parnell on Monday met with Fairbanks officials, community leaders and the media and plans to meet with his cabinet on Wednesday in Juneau.

First Alaskan to die from swine flu

On Monday, Alaska's state epidemiologist has confirmed that a Fairbanks woman has died of complications involving the H1N1 flu virus, commonly known as the swine flu. Citing privacy reasons, DHHS only divulged that the woman was in her 40s and died on July 16 while out of state. Health officials are getting ready for the next flu season and develop an H1N1 vaccine that may be available in Alaska later this year. The state Division of Public Health H1N1 Task Force works with local, state and tribal partners to determine the most effective way to distribute vaccine as it becomes available. Health officials spread the message to stay home when sick, for businesses to get ready for more sick employees and for health care providers and hospitals to prepare for a surge in patient volume.

Department of Energy extends energy stimulus money deadline

The federal Department of Energy said that it would give the State of Alaska until September 30, 2009 to formally request more than $28 million in energy funds available under the Federal Economic Stimulus Act. Former governor Sarah Palin refused to accept the money, saying that it contains too many strings attached. In response, both bodies of the Alaska State legislature will convene in a special session on August 10 to debate an override of Palin's veto.

Eagle Village gets temporary VPSO building, clinic

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers sent three technical disaster response team members to Eagle Village to do a site assessment for the Federal Emergency Management Agency last week. The team is tasked to develop a site design for a temporary public safety office and a temporary health clinic to be completed by Sept. 15, before the highway to the remote village is closed for the winter. During spring break up, the original VPSO office and clinic were shoved 500 feet inland and crushed by ice chunks. FEMA assigned the Corps of Engineers to prepare water, septic tank and electrical connections for the two temporary structures. FEMA is leasing a prefabricated Village Public Safety Office building and a soft-sided clinic facility.

Icebreaker looking for a name

When completed in 2014, the Alaska region research vessel will be one of the most technologically advanced oceanographic vessels in the world. But it is missing something: a name. The ship is designed to be a 242-foot research vessel capable of breaking ice up to 2.5 feet thick and will be used for scientific research in arctic and subarctic waters. Once completed, the university hopes to dock the ARR V in Seward. The name selection committee asks that names be appropriate for a ship dedicated to marine science in Alaska. Terry Whitledge, principal investigator for the ARR V project, suggests that name ideas should reflect something evocative of the polar regions, Alaskana, an outstanding marine scientist or some oceanographic feature. The University of Alaska Fairbanks asks the public to submit ideas for the name of the research vessel.

Money coming down the industrial waste pipeline?

Utility board gets outline of Rock Creek's proposal to pipe treated waste water to sewer lagoons

By Sandra L. Medearis

Alaska Gold Co. needs to dispose of 400 acre-feet of treated tailings water currently stored in a large pond at their Rock Creek Mine north of Nome.

That's a lot of water. An acre-foot is one foot of water covering an acre—400 times a couple cups over 325,851 gallons per acre-foot comes to about 130.3 million gallons.

At its July 21 meeting Nome's utility board heard the details of a proposed pipeline to carry this water from Rock Creek Mine over the tundra to the Bering Sea through Nome's sewage lagoon, possibly beginning April 15. The mine is not operating now, but in the event of startup, a proposed permit would have a life of 10 years with renewal allowed. The water would not have to go through Nome's sewage treatment plant.

NJUS could drain off revenue from the wastewater along the way, said NJUS manager John K. Handeland, who has been working with the city attorney and NJUS's rate analyst to draw up a permit for NJUS and Nome Common Council approval. The permit would cover disposal of existing water and treated wastewater from future mine operation.

Potential revenue to the utility with discharge of up to 250,000 gallons per day could come to $300,000 per year, Handeland told board members. The sewage lagoon can handle that much and more, but just for being hooked up with potential usage but no water going through, AGC would pay a proposed $30,000 to $35,000 a year. Alaska Gold would build the line at its expense and own the line, using heat-traced and insulated pipe measuring 8 inches in diameter, running a distance of 45,000 feet.

Board members sounded skeptical, with Carl Emmons wondering if the water would reach a purity meeting or exceeding that coming from Moonlight Springs, Nome's drinking water source. That would be a requirement to meet Nome's Code of Ordinances Chapter 15 that establishes standards for waste acceptance and testing. The Nome Joint Utility System published tariff allows the issuance of industrial waste permits.

Handeland said Monday that NJUS has had the treated water independently tested and found it that pure. The state Department of Environmental Conservation would also take water samples, he said, with DEC personnel to arrive this week.

"We would know what the water quality was up there, this way, and it would lessen impacts of directly injecting the water into the groundwater," Handeland said. He also said it would alleviate public concerns related to water from Rock Creek Mine, providing a structure for monitoring by NJUS.

Asked after the meeting, then, why the company did not use the reclaimed and pure water for its own water supply, Handeland said the volume was too great.

"The company could handle the discharge itself, running a line from the mine to the Bering Sea without NJUS, but it would take them probably two years to get a permit. If they use our permit, that is in place and adequate, they can get pipe shipped on the last barge and begin construction in late winter when construction would have the least impact on the tundra."

The plan would take 250,000 to 350,000 gallons per day through the lagoon and even more with eventual expansion of mine activities and sewage lagoon. At full operation, the mine could put out 500,000 gallons per day to be treated and discharged through the pipeline, a volume both the pipeline and the sewer lagoon system could handle, according to Handeland.

In other business, the board:

- Discussed the Power Cost Equalization base rate adjustment. Translation: Rural customers receive a dollars-and-cents credit on electric bills, up to 500 kilowatt hours usage per month, based on a calculation stemming from the difference between the higher cost for electric power in rural communities and lower cost in communities with a variety of power resources. Effective with the next billing cycle, the PCE credit goes down to $0.1699 per kwh from $0.1821 per kwh. For a customer using the maximum 500 kwh, the credit would be $84.95 a month, a reduction of $6.10 from the current $91.05 maximum.

- Received a report from Handeland that the City's public works director, Bill Angus, had looked at the East Fifth Avenue drainage issue brought to the NJUS board last meeting. The City would not fill residential lots, but Angus would put additional drainage onto the workbench.

- Received a report from Jerald Brown, chief operating officer for Bering Straits Development Co., that Banner Wind's wind turbines will undergo repairs of certain manufacturing defects and be operative in mid-to late October. One turbine may have to be replaced and the pitch of the blades on the remaining 17 adjusted. Banner Wind LLC is owned 50/50 by Bonanza Fuel and Bering Straits Development Co. Sitnasuak Native Corp. owns Bonanza Fuel. Bering Straits Native Corp. owns BSDC.

Both Kahle and Bagley were employed by the mine's construction contractor Alaska Mechanical Inc. AMI was fined $115,000 after a MSHA report found that management policies and procedures fell short of a responsibility to train employees before they are assigned to operate equipment. In addition, the MSHA report found that the operator was not properly trained, that the manlift hadn't been set on solid ground and that the hydraulic cylinder for the lift wasn't designed for load-bearing support while the boom was extended.

MSHA levied two fines, $50,000 and $65,000, for inadequate training and unsafe equipment use. According to MSHA documents, AMI appealed the fines and has not yet made any payments.

AMI was not named in the lawsuits, because as the employer of Bagley and Kahle, workers' compensation laws apply and protect the Anchorage-based company from workers' lawsuits. According to the state Division of Worker's Compensation, in the case of a work-related death, the company's insurer is supposed to pay $5,000 for funeral expenses and $5,000 to the employee's surviving spouse and children, as well as monthly payments to surviving dependents. As Tyler Kahle had no wife or children, workers' compensation was limited to the funeral expenses and the payment extinguished all possible claims against AMI.

Michele Kahle said in an e-mail correspondence with The Nome Nugget that she and her family grew frustrated with the official investigation after her son's death and set out to investigate the accident on their own. "We got nothing but a run-around from all parties including MSHA when we tried to find out the cause of the accident and had to wait five months to get a superficial report from MSHA," Kahle wrote. She added that filing a lawsuit was necessary to preserve their rights under a two-year statute of limitations. "It allows us access through discovery to information and individuals that we have been denied access to," she wrote.

Much of Kahle's frustration has to do with the Alaska workers' compensation system. In a February hearing before the Alaska Legislature, Kahle testified to change the current system to increase the death benefit if negligence is involved, to abolish the so-called exclusive remedy and to kill a 2004 amendment to the workers' compensation law that extended the exclusive remedy to contractor and project owners.

In short, the Alaska workers' compensation system is laid out as a simple bargain between employers and employees. By purchasing a workers' compensation policy, an employer gains immunity from lawsuits that arise out of workplace injuries or deaths. This so-called exclusiveness of remedy means that the employer who bought workers' compensation insurance knows that there won't be any expensive and time-consuming court cases arising out of workplace accidents. The employee gives up the right to sue for damages in exchange for swift compensation benefits. Part of the deal is also that there is a no fault provision, which means that there are no inquiries into whose fault the accident was.

In 2007, Alaska state Sen. Hollis French sponsored a change to a 2004 amendment to the workers' compensation statutes, which extend immunity to potentially liable employers who don't carry workers' compensation insurance. In his sponsor statement French said, "Because the project owner is potentially liable for purchasing workers' comp policies to cover all the work that takes place at the work site, the project owner enjoys immunity from lawsuits that result from its own negligence." He concluded that this is not fair to the worker and needs to be changed.

SB 147 was discussed in the Senate Labor and Commerce Committee and was referred to the Finance Committee where it sits in limbo. Kahle also said that she expected that the state workers' compensation board would have done their job and followed through with a claim which has gone unresolved without communication for almost a year.

John Lewis, organizer for the Ironworkers Local 751, said in a phone interview with the Nugget that this statute protects contractors and makes it more beneficial to cut corners than adhere to safety precautions.

Kahle said she hopes that the lawsuit will bring to light the root causes of the accident, the responsible parties and remove unsafe equipment from use. "We hope that

Tyler and Craig are the last individuals that will die on that equipment," one e-mail read. "As long as the system stays the same, employers, project owners and contractors will find it cheaper to lose a few people annually than to provide safe working environments, equipment and training to their employees."

port expansion project, funded other economic development projects in Nome and designed the Community Benefit Share program which currently distributes $100,000 annually to each of the company's 15 member communities in the Bering Strait region, the resolution states.

"I noticed that NSEDC is referenced in the body but not in the title," said Councilman Neal Foster, adding that he thinks NSEDC should be included in the title. "I kinda did that on purpose," said Councilman Stan Andersen. "It is a couple of years late."

"Why?" asked Councilman Jon Larson.

"If not for him, I don't think NSEDC would have gone that way," Andersen replied.

Larson said he sees no problem in adding NSEDC to the title. "They're the one with money," he noted.

Andersen suggested that the council consider a separate resolution of appreciation for NSEDC.

"Don't get me wrong," Foster said, emphasizing that Asicksik deserves appreciation, but it should just be spread around.

The council then approved the resolution without amendment. Other resolutions approved by the council authorized:

- A contract with Wendy Chamberlain of Legislative Consultants in Alaska for state lobbying services for $75,000 from July 1, 2009 through June 30, 2010.

- The sale of seven old, City-owned surplus vehicles to the public by means of a sealed bid.

- Adoption of a risk management plan for the City of Nome, the loss control incentive program provided by the Alaska Municipal League Joint Insurance Association. Members of the program earn savings on "soft costs" associated with workers' compensation claims such as training or hiring replacement staff.

- A memorandum of agreement between Norton Sound Health Corp. and the Nome Volunteer Ambulance Department for medevac transport ambulance services. The MOA involves a two-year term during which NSHC will lease a "wet" ambulance with a driver from the City, apply for State of Alaska certification, and contribute $130,000 a year for medevac transports.

Other council actions

The council approved the first reading of an ordinance to dispose of municipal property by land use permit to the Nome Sportsman Association for the Sunset Firing Range at mile 9 of the Nome-Teller Highway for $1 during the term of the permit. The association will use the range for hunter safety training for the community, and for recreational and competitive shotgun, rifle, pistol and archery shooting activities.

Larson asked whether the association would have any problem obtaining $1 million of insurance coverage. "It's already done," replied Steve Smith, a representative of the association. He thanked the council for permitting the association to use the range.

A request from Louie Green Jr., dba Louie's Cab and Delivery, to transfer two taxi licenses to Jason M. Song was approved by the council. The council also approved the appointment of Jeff Darling to the Nome Planning Commission.

Landfill inspection report

Ken Spiers, environmental program specialist for the Solid Waste Program, Department of Environmental Conservation, sent a report to Bahnke following his inspection of the Beam Road landfill, the Nome inert waste monofill and the closed class II landfill on July 7.

Spiers said the old closed landfill is still in good shape, noting that the department does not score closed facilities. The inert waste monofill adjacent to the closed landfill is also in good shape and received a compliance score of 93 percent, he reported. However, he listed a few administrative problems that need to be addressed.

Spiers gave the Beam Road Landfill a compliance score of 90 percent, which he said is an improvement over last year, and he credited City Engineer Jim Vogel with correcting many of the administrative deficiencies noted last year.

Among outstanding issues that Spiers said still need attention is insufficient cover on the landfill. "Because of the paucity of cover, there were numerous gulls and ravens and quite a bit of wind-blown trash," he noted. "A good deal of trash had blown under the new litter fence, as there are numerous gaps of over a foot between the soil and the bottom of the net. I recommend loads of dirt or gravel be used to fill the gaps."

Spiers also noted that monitoring for surface water contamination, methane gas and thermistors was not done last year.

In response to questions from council members about addressing problems at the landfill identified by Spiers, Bahnke said water monitoring has begun, options for providing adequate cover on the landfill are being considered, and she will check whether gaps at the bottom of the new litter fence are being filled.

• Mining

has said she mines in Specimen Gulch, but she has not mined there since 1999.

Leedy opposes permit

Copies of two letters from Leedy to the Nome Common Council dated June 30 and July 7 were included in the packet for the Monday council meeting. In both letters Leedy urged the council to deny Rapose a permit to mine in the Moonlight Wells Protection Area. When he wrote the letters, Leedy apparently did not know that the City had issued an annual Moonlight Wells placer mining permit to Rapose on June 24.

"The Rapose operation has not complied with the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's requirement and has violated the federal Clean Water Act in 2008 and May and June 2009," Leedy asserts in his letter of June 30.

"The applicant has already misrepresented the truth to the City by burying large quantities of used petroleum products in the Watershed Protective Area as well as making false statements to the City of the disposal of many large lead acid batteries," Leedy added.

During the council meeting on Monday, Andersen referred to Leedy's assertion that Rapose had buried contaminants at the mine site. Andersen asked Public Works Director Bill Angus whether he is certain that Rapose did not bury the contaminants that Angus had cited as permit violations and had told Rapose to remove from the mine site.

Angus replied that during his final inspection of the site he had visually verified that all of the violations, including batteries and barrels, had been moved off the site. He said they are in town.

Questionable permit issued

As reported in recent editions of the Nugget, Angus cited multiple permit violations at the NAGC mine site and Rapose's failure to remove the violations in a report to City Manager Josie Bahnke dated June 22. Council members read the report at a meeting June 22 and amended a resolution (R-09-06-04) to issue a Moonlight Wells mining permit to NACG with the following recommendations by Angus as written in his report:

"1. Grant temporary permit effective in a week, subject to removal of all violations (verified by me).

"2. Final and proper...disposition of all offensive materials to be physically inspected and verified by me. (It is too easy to simply bury things out there).

"3. Over excavation and proper disposal of all contaminated soils (verified by me prior to backfill).

"4. Submit to random, unrestricted, and unscheduled site inspections at interval not to exceed two weeks."

The council then approved the resolution as amended.

On July 10, the Nugget learned that Angus issued an annual mining permit for 2009 instead of a temporary permit to NAGC on June 24 after verifying that all violations had been removed from the site.

On July 20 Bahnke provided the Nugget with the official signed version of resolution R-09-06-04, dated June 22, which grants an annual Moonlight Wells permit to NAGC for the 2009 mining season subject to the following additional conditions:

"1. The permit shall not be issued or effective until the Public works Director has verified that:

"a) all objectionable material has been removed from the site including but not limited to the following:

"i) lead acid batteries

"ii) all 55 gallon drums of various lubricants

"iii) all 5 gallon pails of various lubricants

"iv) all jugs of anti-freeze; and

"b) all contaminated soil on site has been over excavated and properly disposed of.

"2. The Public Works Director shall use the authority granted the City to make random unscheduled inspections pursuant to condition 'B' of the permit at least once every two weeks during the term of the permit." Condition B of the permit reads: "The permittee shall allow the City Manager or his representative access to the permitted sites at reasonable times to conduct scheduled or unscheduled inspections or tests to determine compliance with the permit, City laws, and regulations."

The City has not explained the discrepancy between the version of Resolution No. R-09-06-04 approved by the council June 22 and the official signed version of R-09-06-04. Included in the packet for the council meeting Monday was a new flow chart for a Moonlight Wells permit process.

Rock Creek wastewater

Utilities Manager John Handeland told the council on Monday that Nome Joint Utility System is discussing with Alaska Gold Co. officials the possibility of piping water from behind the tailings dam at the Rock Creek Mine to the City of Nome's sewage lagoons. He said the company has a permit from the state Department of Environmental Conservation to treat the water on site and then re-inject it into the ground, but there is more water than the company can deal with so they are looking for a creative alternative.

A proposed agreement for the project between NJUS and Alaska Gold Co. was discussed during an NJUS board meeting July 21, Handeland added. (See story on page 4.)

In answer to a question from Andersen, Handeland said the proposed pipeline would be 8 inches in diameter, heat traced and attached to sleepers to prevent movement.

Councilman Jon Larson asked how water piped from the mine would be treated in the City's lagoon. Handeland said it would be treated by aeration after being dumped in one cell and then dumped in a second cell.

"What is the capacity of the lagoon?" Larson asked.

"Well over 1 million gallons," replied Handeland. "Our current permit is for 847,000 gallons; the daily average is 450,000 gallons, so we would still be below the current operations permit."

Eager hunters camp out on Front Street for moose permits

By Tyler Rhodes

The first arrivals may have been mistaken for loiterers hanging outside the doors of the state building along Nome's Front Street July 23.

But by 8 p.m. the scene looked like a block party. Camp chairs and their occupants made a horseshoe around the covered entryway in front of the building. Kids zoomed around on scooters and bicycles. Emissaries went out to bring back food and drinks for those who remained behind reading books or playing around on their laptop computers.

All were hoping the clear skies and warm weather would hold as they settled in for a long night of sitting and waiting.

It wasn't tickets for the Superbowl or a Rolling Stones concert that drove the crowd to camp out on what started out as one of the warmest nights of the year.

It was moose. Cow moose, in particular.

Each year at this time, the Alaska Department of Fish and Game offers a limited number of permits for cow moose in unit 22C on a first-come, first-serve basis. With 30 permits up for grabs and a quota of 15 moose this year, the line formed early on a Thursday for the permits that wouldn't be available until after 8 a.m. the next morning.

Cory Erickson was the first arrival for this year's offering, planting himself down next to the building's doors in his camp chair at 10 a.m. last Thursday. "We missed it last year," he said. By noon the second in line had come, and throughout the day the group of would-be hunters would incrementally grow.

By the time midnight rolled around, approximately 20 permit-seekers were sprawled out on the sidewalk or in their chairs. Some had their children or friends waiting with them. It was an orderly scene. People chatted about their previous hunts or how the work on the camp was going this summer. Someone had created number tags out of a cardboard box so that people would know where they stood in the line. People could slip out of line for a few minutes to search out a restroom or snack without fear of losing their spot.

ADF&G biologist Tony Gorn said he sees familiar faces each year for Nome's antlerless hunt, which perhaps adds to the easy nature of the line. Gorn said in similar permit offerings around the state, sometimes Alaska State Troopers need to stand guard to keep the peace.

Gorn said Nome's system of offering the permits has evolved a bit over the years. The office places a list of the ground rules on the door—applicants must stay in line, but can trade out their spot. Applicants can only hold one spot in line. One permit per household. Don't litter...etc. "The first year we did it, it looked more like people waiting for concert tickets," Gorn said.

For this fall's hunts, 10 of the 30 permits were offered for the Nome and Snake river valleys. That hunt will close when five moose are taken. The other 20 permits cover the remainder of unit 22C. That hunt will close when 10 moose are harvested. The hunt closes in the entire unit Sept. 30 if the quotas are not met.

Some were able to show up last Friday morning to grab the few remaining permits. "It seems like every time we have this hunt, we have some people that show up very early the day before," Gorn said. "But there's always people who can show up right at 8 a.m. and get a permit." Such was the case this year. A waiting list is created for those who don't make the cut. There are already a few on that list this year, Gorn said.

The permit rules allow hunters with a cow permit to also hold a permit for the bull moose hunt, which occurs the first two weeks of September. Some will get the cow permit as a fall-back if they are unable to harvest a bull. Those who do harvest a bull can turn their cow permit back in to allow someone on the waiting list a chance to hunt an antlerless moose. Local rules allow only one moose to be harvested per household.

After two hard winters in a row—this year's with near record snowfall—the number of permits offered were reduced from last year. In the fall of 2008, 40 permits were offered for the entire unit with a quota of 30 antlerless moose.

The harsh conditions in February and March didn't just give the moose grief, but also ADF&G personnel. Gorn said the line-up of storms that pummeled the region also prevented him from conducting the annual moose census. The census allows ADF&G to gauge the health and size of the moose population.

By the time the weather had relented, there was too much other work to be done to allow the census to proceed. "I was put in the position, where I either had to scrap my moose census or scrap everything else I had to do in March," he said. "I decided to give up on the moose census and focused on catching our musk ox and weighing our moose calves, and doing all the other census stuff we do in the spring."

DINNER TIME—Nomeites camping out for antlerless moose permits eat dinner and lounge in the sun as they prepare to spend the night out in front of the state building.

Gorn said he is taking the conservative approach this year because of the affect an antlerless moose hunt can have on a population. "The only reason you have an antlerless moose hunt is to stabilize or reduce the population," he said.

Over the past few years, Gorn said there has been an effort to reduce the population in Unit 22C. "We knew, for our comfort level, that there were too many moose in the area because of the amount of winter habitat," he said. The quota was upped in 2008, he said, because even with the antlerless hunts of the past few years, the population was still experiencing a 3 percent annual growth rate.

Gorn said conducting the moose census next year will be a high priority for his office.

Unalakleet River gets best king salmon run in years

By Laurie McNicholas

On Sunday the cumulative count of king salmon escapement into the North River and an aerial survey of the upper Unalakleet River and Old Woman River confirmed the best run of king salmon in years, reports Scott Kent, assistant area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue for the Alaska Department of Fish and Game. The Old Woman and North rivers are tributaries of the Unalakleet River.

Through July 26, a cumulative total of 2,172 king salmon had passed the counting tower on the North River. On the same day Kent counted 1,368 kings in the upper Unalakleet and Old Woman rivers during an aerial survey.

"We have not even come close to that count in aerial surveys for a long time," Kent said. "In 1997 the aerial count was 984 king salmon in the upper Unalakleet River and 246 in the Old Woman River. This year I counted 938 kings on the Unalakleet River and 430 at the Old Woman River.

"Considering you miss about 40 to 50 percent under good survey conditions, it's possible that the upper Unalakleet River king salmon escapement could be around 2,700 to 3,400," he continued. "Adding this to the North River tower counts, you come up with a drainage-wide king salmon escapement estimate ranging from 4,900 to 5,500 fish.

"Radio telemetry data from the late 1990s estimated that 39 percent of Unalakleet River king salmon escapement migrated up the North River," Kent explained. "Using the tower counts and this abundance estimate, you arrive at about 5,600 king salmon for a drainage-wide escapement estimate. Either way, the aerial survey observations are fairly consistent with the North River tower counts."

This is only the second year since 2001 that kings have surpassed the mid-range of the escapement goal of 1,200 to 2,400 past the North River tower. In 2007 the number of king salmon counted at the North River tower totaled 1,948. Only 903 king salmon were counted at the tower in 2008.

Kent said the quality of this year's Unalakleet River king salmon run has improved significantly compared to recent years, with older age classes and larger females escaping to spawning grounds. "We projected that 30 percent of the run would be 6 years or older," he noted. "A preliminary analysis of the 2009 age data suggests that it will be 30 percent plus." He reported finding one or two 7-year-old king salmon this year. "We had not detected any 7-year-olds since 2004," he added.

On July 24 Kent visited king salmon spawning grounds at the Old Woman River, three hours by boat from Unalakleet, where he found age-4 king ("jack") salmon along with larger kings. Based on his findings he believes the outlook may improve for the king salmon runs in the next two years.

To protect the older fish in this year's run, on June 29 ADF&G imposed a set gillnet six-inch mesh size restriction on subsistence salmon fishing in the Unalakleet River drainage and marine waters of the Shaktoolik and Unalakleet subdistrict. The department closed all subsistence and sport fishing for king salmon in those areas July 4. Subsistence fishing for kings reopened only in the lower Unalakleet River on July 16.

Kent said the strategy of restricting gillnet mesh sizes to six inches worked. Although the department had to close subsistence fishing to achieve king salmon escapement goals, he said that most of the subsistence fishers he talked to in Unalakleet had met their subsistence needs by that time. Despite mesh size restrictions, the majority of subsistence catches were comprised of large kings, which are valued both for their size and oil content.

Contestants pan fast and furious at 11th annual Poorman's Paradise

By Tyler Rhodes

Under the pressure of the clock and in the shadow of the statues of the Three Lucky Swedes, men, women, boys and girls of all ages put their prospecting skills to the test last Thursday in the 11th annual Poorman's Paradise Gold Panning Contest.

Sponsored by Rasmussen's Music Mart, the Gold Prospectors Association of America and the Nome Chamber of Commerce, the competition is a race against the clock to pull three gold nuggets out of a sand-filled gold pan. After a short opening presentation by Ralph Rodgers on gold panning, the competitors were on their own to work their pans over large totes filled with water in Anvil City Square. For the first few finishers, the instruction was obviously unnecessary.

In just a little more than 15.5 seconds, Californian Blake Harman shook out and tossed the three nuggets on the table to take the top honors this year. Only a half second slower was Ken Rucker, also from California, who took second place. A Nomeite, Nick Klescewski, rounded out the top three with his time of 17 seconds.

While many of the competitors were visitors from the GPAA Cripple Creek camp, many Nomeites stepped up to the table to try their hand at the passion that has drawn fortune-seekers to Seward Peninsula beaches for more than a century. Some proved pretty quick at panning. Nome's Cynthia Outwater showed some skill with the pan, singling out the nuggets in a minute and 8 seconds. Even 6-year-old Traci Karmun—with a little help from Outwater—was able to toss the three nuggets onto the table in 1:09.

Others took a little more time to perfect their form. Nome's Liz Murphy worked the pan with too gentle a touch for several minutes, spurring many around her to give tips and advice on how best to separate the sand from the paydirt. When told she needed to shake it a bit more, Murphy's technique resembled more a salsa dance than a sluice box. Nevertheless, she remained determined; and six minutes after she started, with a smile still on her face, Murphy deposited the three nuggets on the table.

Summer Fest rocks again

By Bruce Klein

It's magical when everything comes together for one day, and that is precisely what happened for Summer Fest 2009. The second annual "Nome has Talent" competition was more than a huge success; it kind of took our breath away.

The weather cooperated, the sun came out and the heat was turned up. The audience doubled from last year, and the 13 acts this year more than doubled the inaugural set, with much help from a youth group from California.

Kellen Baker proved to be King of Summer Fest, repeating as winner of the talent contest. Not to be outdone, two California youth took second and third place, Candice Rubio for second and Erika Faries earning a third-place finish following a "play-off" with Travis Carlisle for the final spot on the podium.

Other contestants were Eddie Tate, Buford Sallaffie, Tatianna Kufferath, Chantz Aluska, Naomi Jorgenson, Bailey Nelson, "Human Video" with Amanda Faries, Holly, Kim, Johnathan, Scott, Howell, Franny and Vicki; "Scream of Intensity” with Nathaniel, Joel and Scott; and kicking off the competition were Shawn Kacena and Cory Reynolds.

The Gold Beach Skaters provided an opportunity to eat with fresh hamburgers and chips. The National Park Service stayed busy providing face painting for the younger children. Jeremy Master from the City of Nome Department of Parks and Recreation and Lance Cannon from Kawerak Division of Child and Family Services provided games for the children. Phil Schobert and Bush907.com provided sound and music for the contestants, as well as open Karaoke for all ages and musical abilities. John Handeland was emcee extraordinaire and did a fantastic job.

Nome Community Center has been the main sponsor for the last two years, providing Nome Nugget advertising, utilizing the opportunity to keep the event smoke-free. Other sponsors included Community Schools and Nome Public Schools, Polar Café, Car Quest, Kawerak Inc., Bonanza Express, Alaska Commercial Co. and Syracuse University.

Two years ago Al Burgo from Bush907.com came up with the idea, noting that there is an abundance of youth talent in Nome, but no showcase for it. This was the start of Summer Fest 2008. The last two years they have run the talent showcase and contest on a shoestring budget. Getting ready for Summer Fest 2010 will be a challenge to step everything up one notch.

This showcase has been a work of love for all those offering their time and efforts. Planning for Summer Fest 2010, slated for July 31, will begin this September. Anyone interested in being a part of this opportunity, please contact Bruce Klein at 304-1604.

Under sunny skies, bikers, runners and walkers tackle annual Wyatt Earp Dexter Challenge

By Tyler Rhodes

Wielding bikes, running shoes and even crutches, 45 runners, walkers and bikers toed the line Saturday for the annual Wyatt Earp Dexter Challenge race.

Mostly sunny skies greeted the field of participants who had their choice of a 12-mile bike along the Nome-Council Highway and Beam Road, an 8-mile run along the Nome-Teller Highway and the Dexter Pass Road or a 5-mile walk along the length of the Dexter Pass Road. The runners and bikers started outside Old St. Joe's Hall in the center of Nome, while the walkers started at the intersection of the Dexter Pass Road and the Nome-Teller Highway.

Biker Joel Rose was the first to find his way to the finish line in Dexter, cruising in at 49 minutes, 19 seconds. Rose enjoyed a comfortable lead over a familiar face as his son, Jeffrey Rose, claimed the second spot nearly seven minutes later. The first—and only—woman to tackle the bike course was Jennifer Goslin, who finished in 1:05:36.

When it came to the runners, high schooler Teddy Payenna was able to add yet another victory to his list this summer. Payenna, who also captured wins in the Gold Dust Dash and Anvil Mountain Run, burned up the trail up and over the Dexter Pass in a time of 54:35. That was enough to give him a nearly two-minute advantage over runner-up Tyler Rhodes who has had to watch the backside of Payenna pull away from him about half way through each race held in Nome this summer. Nathaniel Olson rounded out the men's top three finishing in 58:55.

For the second year in a row, Jamie Burford led the charge for the women. Burford's time of 1:06:19 was more than three minutes faster than her winning time from the previous year. Shanna Moeder, accompanied by her four-legged sidekick Spalding, crossed the line next for the women at 1:14:53.

In the walking division, Rick Schmidt poured it on at the end to shuffle across the line first in 1:07:20. Shortly after Schmidt crossed the line, Brenden Raymond-Yakoubian finished his walk in 1:07:35.

The last participant to cross the finish for the day was likely also the toughest. Showing true grit, Elise

Davis walked up and over the Dexter Pass with the aid of crutches. On the mend from a broken leg, Davis had been getting around town in a wheelchair just a few weeks ago.

The annual race is sponsored by Norton Sound Health Corp.'s CAMP Department. This year's race was assisted by Nome-Beltz High School cross-country coach Jeff Collins.

For those looking for more competition, the Nome-Beltz swim team is putting on a triathlon on Sunday. The race, which starts and ends at the pool, features a 20-lap swim, 6-mile run and 6-mile bike. The swim and run can be split in two for those wanting to share the burden for those portions of the race. Registration begins at noon with the race start at 1 p.m.

Teller man held in death of infant son

By Sandra L. Medearis

Alaska State Troopers sent units to Teller to arrest Frank David "Punchy" Lee, 35, on murder charges in the "shaken baby" death of his seven-month-old son.

Shaken Baby Syndrome is a form of child abuse where the abuser violently shakes a baby or small child creating a whiplash motion causing acceleration-deceleration injuries that can lead to death or severe brain injuries.

A grand jury in Nome handed up an indictment July 17 charging Lee on Murder One and Murder Two in incidents "on or between" June 8 to Oct. 11 last year, according to court documents, that resulted in the death of Harley Dickson on Oct. 13, 2008. According to the indictment, Lee "knowingly engaged in conduct directed towards a child under 16 and with criminal negligence inflicted serious injury on the child by at least two separate acts, and one of the acts resulted in the death of the child."

A medivac flight took young Dickson from Teller to Providence

Alaska Medical Center in Anchorage Oct. 12. He was taken off life support the next day and died. Megan Peters, Alaska State Troopers spokeswoman, said the baby showed classic signs of "shaken baby syndrome." When a physician's exam showed the baby had been injured, the hospital called Anchorage Police Department. APD then called troopers as Teller was in their jurisdiction, Peters said.

The existence of a the July 17 indictment was kept secret because rumors existed that Lee had said he would kill himself or shoot troopers who came to arrest him, according to court files. A court official hand-carried a warrant for Lee's arrest to the AST to prevent leaks. Troopers arrested Lee without incident in Teller mid-morning July 21. He appeared the same day in court for arraignment.

Lee's indictment followed nine months' investigation by troopers. When troopers learn of a case after the fact, Peters said, it requires a lot more in-depth investigation and a much longer process talking to many people to recover facts and document evidence.

Lee remains in Anvil Mountain Correctional Center in Nome under $100,000 bail. At arraignment, Lee requested his bail be reduced to $5,000, but Judge Ben Esch ruled the higher bail remain in effect. If Lee makes bail, he will be brought back to court to hear conditions for his release, according to court records.

Lee has a lengthy rap sheet with multiple charges of burglaries, thefts, bootlegging and assaults, filed in Anchorage and Nome. In 1992 he was arrested on first-degree sexual assault and second degree sexual abuse of a minor. He achieved a plea deal and drew a sentence of four years in prison.

Details considered in the indictment and specific details in the baby's death were not available, as grand jury proceedings are always secret and sealed.

However, the court calendar shows a hearing slated for Sept. 14 where state prosecution and defense attorneys will perform procedures leading to the trial, currently scheduled to begin in Nome on Oct. 16.

Local attorney Bob Lewis of the Nome firm Lewis and Thomas P. C. will defend Lee through the Office of Public Advocacy. The public defender agency could not represent Lee, as they are already representing one of the witnesses. Assistant District Attorney Gregg Olson will prosecute for the state.

Saying it Sincerely

By Pastor David Elmore,
Community United Methodist Church
For the Nome Ministerial Association

Reference: 2 Samuel 11: 1-15

Richard Millhouse Nixon created an "enemies list" and used the "available federal apparatus" to intimidate those witnesses, using those affiliated with federal agencies to wiretap the Democratic National Committee, and then engineering a massive cover up. A boss hires a new assistant and makes clear to that assistant that they are at the bosses' beck and call around the clock and makes clear, though it is never quite said that providing sexual favors are part of this arrangement. A young United States purchases the Alaska territory from Russia and immediately tries to civilize a 10,000-year-old civilization. Civilized would mean giving up their language, culture, and respect for the created world, learn English, adopt the Christian religion, and exploit the territory's resources.

Now what do all of these situations have in common? In one way or another, these are all abuses of power. Our passage today contains the granddaddy of them all in terms of abuse of power in the scriptures . . . David and Bathsheba. David was king.

In 1 Samuel 18, God tells the Hebrew people that Kings will continually take from the people. Just as God had said, David took. So, one spring, the time when kings go off to war, David decides to stay home. While he was home, he spotted Bathsheba taking a bath. Anyway, David saw her, he took her, and he lay with her. Bathsheba is silent. What could she do? She has no voice. The light of this passage shines brightly on David's sin.

This would be the end of the story except that Bathsheba became pregnant. This child is David's. And we hear Bathsheba's voice — just this once, "I am pregnant." Three words, but the message could not be clearer. There is a limit to the king's power. And rather than own up to his sin, power drunk King David comes up with a cover-up plan. When the cover-up fails, David commits the ultimate abuse of power and has Uriah killed.

So what does this mean for the Bathshebas of the world? Korean-American theologian Andrew Sung Park, in his book "From Hurt to Healing: A Theology of the Wounded" identifies a separate pattern of God's work in the lives of the Bathshebas of this world. While the process for the sinner is sin, guilt, shame, repentance, confession, forgiveness and sanctification, the process for the oppressed is different: wounds, shame, resistance, forgiveness, justice, healing and joy. Now it is rarely as clear cut as this, as the oppressed often become sinners as well, and we both must experience forgiveness and liberation in our lives. But our ultimate hope today is that we serve a God who is capable, willing and accessible to do both. Let us all this week confess our sins, lift up our wounds, and trust them all to God that we may experience God's grace and the abundant life that we are given by God's grace through Jesus Christ. Amen.

HOROSCOPES

July 30 - August 5, 2009

CAPRICORN
December 22–
January 19

This week is all about counting your blessings, Capricorn. You have so much to be thankful for. Romance turns a bit costly; scale back. That special someone will not care.

ARIES
March 21–
April 19

Try not to get swept in the hype this week, Aries. Stick to what you know, and you will be rewarded. A major change at home puts everyone on cloud nine.

CANCER
June 22–
July 22

Nothing in life is free, Cancer. Stop looking for the easy way out and start learning the value of hard work. A tryst at work gets the gossip mill brewing.

LIBRA
September 23–
October 22

You know the odds are stacked against you, Libra, but you go forth with an idea anyway and win. Bravo! A money matter could use more research.

AQUARIUS
January 20–
February 18

A friend is feeling blue and could use a pick-me-up. Be there for them, Aquarius. Wanderlust stirs, and places afar begin to call. Call your travel agent and get busy packing.

TAURUS
April 20–
May 20

Stop, Taurus. You've financed someone else's dream for long enough. Cut your losses and get out. A new face provides a change of pace at work.

LEO
July 23–
August 22

Yikes, Leo. You depend on a family member one too many times, and they bail on you. Pick up the pieces, learn your lesson and move on. A memo puts on the pressure.

SCORPIO
October 23–
November 21

A family member tests your resolve. Don't give in, Scorpio. You are better than that. A face-to-face confrontation goes much better than expected.

PISCES
February 19–
March 20

You don't like to lie, but you may have no choice, Pisces. The truth could crush a dear friend's spirit. A trip down memory lane sparks an idea.

GEMINI
May 21–
June 21

Misery loves company, Gemini, but that doesn't mean you have to take part. See the good in others and work hard to stay positive. Laughter is contagious.

VIRGO
August 23–
September 22

Have faith in yourself, and there is nothing you cannot do, Virgo. Go for the brass ring, and it will be yours. A flippant attitude of a young friend is no reason to be disgruntled.

SAGITTARIUS
November 22–
December 21

This week is all about taking risks, Sagittarius. You cannot play it safe forever, or life will pass you by. A rumor begins circling. Take it with a grain of salt.

Obituaries

Lily Mary Tetpon Amuktoolik

Lily Mary Tetpon Amuktoolik was born on February 22, 1939 to Lucy and Julius Tetpon in Stebbins. She joined her sibling Marie Tyson. She went to be with our lord in heaven on June 23, 2009.

On May 21, 1955 in White Mountain, she and David Amuktoolik were joined together in a lifelong marriage. Together they had seven children, Laura, Marie, David Jr., Bernice, Darla, Janet, and Eric.

Lily Mary Tetpon Amuktoolik

In the early 1960s she started working with the United States Postal Services, and served as the local postmistress, where she retired her committed services in 2004.

She was a dedicated Bering Air Village agent for 27 years. She would share with her customers flying with Bering Air, that they were "flying with a first class airline." And since then, she always kept her family and friends informed of the weather for their safety during travels throughout the region.

In her younger years she was a Sunday school teacher and loved singing gospels with her husband and daughter Bernice.

They provided a strong subsistence lifestyle for their family. This includes her many years of commercial fishing and even sometimes being named as "Top Boat" for that fishing season.

She enjoyed putting away fish and picking berries with her family. In the springtime she, David, Irene and Sig would go out bird hunting. In her free time she would sew parkas, mukluks, hats, down blankets, and crochet.

Her home was filled with many different plants demonstrating her green thumb in the family. She loved sharing her homemade breads and cranberry sauce and agutuk during family get togethers

She was preceded in death by her parents, husband, David Amuktoolik, Sr., brother-in-law William Tyson, and many close family members and friends.

She is survived by her sisters and brothers Marie Tyson, Laura and husband Tonashay, Marie and husband Jon, David and companion Valerie Barber, Bernice and husband Charlie, Darla and husband Gary, Janet and husband Thomas, Eric and companion Maureen Aukon, and many grandchildren, great-grandchildren, nieces and nephews.

City powerless against rotting carcasses

By Tyler Rhodes

Most of the calls Nome Animal Control Officer Amy Smithhisler receives revolve around dogs—whether they’re barking, biting or just running loose.

A call she received earlier this summer came as a departure—the subjects were still and silent. Virtually in Smithhisler’s backyard, a musher had come across a pile of rotting, putrid carcasses. Uncertain if they were dogs culled from someone’s lot, the musher called the animal control officer to investigate.

The pile of nearly a dozen skinned and decomposing animals were found on a trail located between the Nome-Teller Highway and the Center Creek Road. After receiving the call, Smithhisler traveled the trail which connects to the bike path next to the Nome-Teller Highway right by her house.

The pile was not difficult to find. Dumped right on the path next to the hollowed-out carcass of an airplane, the dead animals were a little more than a half mile in on the trail used by walkers and bikers. The trail is also frequented by mushers who will run their dogs with sleds in the winter and four-wheelers in snow-free conditions. “All kinds of people go up there,” Smithhisler said.

Smithhisler said she pushed the pile over to the side to at least get it off the trail. “It was just a little irritating,” she said. “Of all the places you could take them and no one would know, and you go and throw them next to a well-used trail.”

Smithhisler said she was fairly certain the carcasses were not dogs, but more likely foxes. She called Alaska State Wildlife Trooper Brian Miller to report the find. Miller confirmed that the animals looked to primarily be foxes with perhaps some wolverine or lynx thrown in.

Miller said he received a couple calls on the matter and went out to investigate twice just to ensure it was the same pile of dead animals being reported. Miller said the dumping did not appear to constitute any illegal activity. “There’s no state law that it violates to put the carcasses specifically where they are,” Miller said. “I know in some specific areas there are some laws against dumping them on a roadway.”

Despite the path being a well-established two-track, Nome City Manager Josie Bahnke said the route does not appear as a dedicated roadway on any map. She also said she could find no item in the city code that applied to the dumping of carcasses. “We looked at a map and tried to approach it from a couple of different directions, but didn’t come up with anything—which is not to say we couldn’t in the future,” Bahnke said.

Nome’s ordinances on animals primarily relate to dogs and other pets. The ordinances governing health and safety deal largely with food and the businesses that sell it. There’s no mention in the code of littering whether it be a bag of garbage or a pile of skinned fur-bearers. The nuisance provisions in the code deal mainly with structures and physical property. “There’s no clear cut law on the books that deals with this,” Bahnke said.

The city does have rules limiting and regulating the trapping of animals within city limits. However, there is no evidence at the site that the animals were trapped there. Rather it appears that the animals which were likely trapped elsewhere and were just dumped on the trail after they were skinned.

Smithhisler said even without a law prohibiting the dumping of animal carcasses within city limits, it’s simply poor form to throw them where people and their pets or dog teams regularly travel. “All you have to do is throw them in a garbage bag and throw them in your blue dumpster, and they would go to the landfill,” she said. “There’s hundreds of acres out there where you could dump them and no one would know.”

Thunder and lightning give Nome a show

By Tyler Rhodes

The first couple of rumblings could have been mistaken for a jet overhead for Nomeites accustomed to hearing at least three or four of the big planes flying in and out of town each day. But by the fourth of fifth big bang it was unmistakable, Nome was hearing thunder.

On the warmest day of the year so far—just 1 degree short of 80—Nome experienced a lightning and thunder storm July 21. After several hours of warm winds and sunshine, dark clouds and columns of rain raced across the tundra and hills surrounding Nome from roughly 9 p.m. to 10:30 p.m. Accompanying the short storm bursts were flashes of lightning and the rumble of thunder.

On the heels of the storm, a thin layer of smoke drifted over the area and remained through the next day. The sun July 22, veiled by the smoky haze, appeared as a dull ruddy orb. By the evening the thunder and lightning were back for a second round. “For the second night in a row, Nome was greeted with a thunderous hello,” reads a statement from the National Weather Service. “Two strong bands of thunder and rain pelted the Gold Rush City starting at 8:30 p.m. with the thunder leaving at 10:02 p.m., and the rain quitting at 10:23 p.m. This is highly unusual for this area, but given the higher temperatures and instability in the atmosphere not unexpected.”

Communities to get $1 million for energy funds

By Laurie McNicholas

The Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. board of directors established an energy fund of $1 million for each member community July 31 during the final session of a four-day meeting in Nome.

The company represents 15 Bering Strait communities in the Western Alaska Community Development Program.

During a meeting in April in Unalakleet, the NSEDC board granted $1 million to the Unalakleet Valley Electric Cooperative to supplement state funding for a wind farm. The cooperative had requested $8.8 million from the Alaska Energy Authority's renewable energy fund, but was awarded only $4 million.

At the April meeting, board member Don Stiles of Nome initially made a motion for NSEDC to donate $1.3 million to UVEC's wind farm project. Several board members objected to the move, complaining that some of the company's member communities receive more benefits than do others.

Board Chairman Dan Harrelson of White Mountain told them that he and NSEDC's Chief Executive Officer Janis Ivanoff had discussed setting up a fund to provide $1 million to each of NSEDC's member communities to help them address high energy costs. He also suggested amending Stiles' motion to reduce the UVEC

Council wants independent look at Rock Creek proposal

Study of wastewater line to sewage lagoon approved

By Laurie McNicholas

During its Aug. 10 meeting, the Nome Common Council unanimously approved a motion by Councilwoman Mary Knodel for an independent study of a proposal to pipe water from behind a tailings dam at the Rock Creek Mine to the city's sewage lagoon. The mine is closed, but is may resume operation in the future.

Knodel wants the council to work with an engineer independent of the mining company and Nome Joint Utility System to resolve questions about the proposed project, including these: What will the wastewater actually do to the city's sewage ponds? Are the ponds big enough to accommodate the wastewater from the mine? Will the project cost or save money for the City? Is the current operations permit for the sewage lagoon adequate for the proposed wastewater project?

Elementary, Nome-Beltz still struggling

Superintendent Wehde says closer look at the numbers shows improvements

By Tyler Rhodes

On their face, the results are stark. For the second year in a row, Nome's elementary and junior/senior high schools ranked at the bottom of the state's yearly assessment for school performance. In what the state dubs "adequate yearly progress," or AYP, the two schools have worked their way to, and remained at, a level 5 ranking—the most severe on the scale of 1-5.

The AYP yardstick measures how students in the state's schools score on math, reading and writing tests given over three days each April. The percentage of students in grades 3-10 deemed proficient in the categories largely determines if a school is said to make AYP. Other items such as graduation rates, attendance and improvement over a previous year's results also factor into AYP.

Of the five entities that comprise the Nome Public School District, three missed the AYP mark. In addition to the elementary and junior/senior high schools, the Nome Youth Facility was also given a failing grade. Superintendent Jon Wehde, however, believes the assessment of the youth facility was done in error since the failing grade appears to be based solely on its graduation rate.

For most of its students, the school is a temporary situation, serving youth remanded to the facility by courts or law enforcement. Once students are released from the facility, they normally return to their home school. "Quite frankly nearly all students that are with us in the Nome Youth Facility eventually matriculate back at their home school site," Wehde said. "It's a rarity they graduate from the facility."

Wehde said he has contacted the Alaska Department of Education and Early Development to see if a mistake was made. "I think we just have a glitch," Wehde said. "[Graduation] is not a significant factor in regard to the education at the facility. I'm not sure where that came from."

The other two elements within the district, the Extensions Correspondence School and Anvil City Science Academy, both made the grade in terms of AYP. The Extensions program serves seven home-schooled students. The academy is the district's charter school serving students in fifth through eighth grades.

Anvil City was the bright spot in the district with 95 percent or more of its students scoring proficient in reading and writing, and 90 percent scoring proficient in math. "We saw a typical high performance by the Anvil City Science Academy. We are certainly proud of that," Wehde said. "It's very indicative of their past performances."

Even with the district's largest two schools at the bottom of the rankings, Wehde still sees glimmerings of improvement in the numbers. "I'm encouraged, but I'm definitely not satisfied," he said of the overall results. While the bottom line for the state may be whether a school makes or does not make AYP in all the given categories, the assessments provide the schools with more than just a pass/fail grade.

For Nome Elementary, scores in the language sections of the test improved enough for the school to make AYP in that category. The school scored 59 percent proficient in language in 2007-2008 and did not make AYP. Overall in the last school year, the school scored 61 percent

Sobocienski officially named Sitnasuak President and CEO

After leading Nome’s Native corporation in an interim status since this spring, Trudy Sobocienski has been officially named the president and chief executive officer of Sitnasuak Native Corp.

By moving into the president’s seat, Sobocienski is required to give up her seat on the Native corporation’s board of directors per a recently enacted rule barring employees from being board members. To that end, Sitnasuak is soliciting applicants to fill the open position. The term held by Sobocienski expires in May 2011.

Sobocienski was appointed interim president and CEO after Robert Fagerstrom left the position. Neither Fagerstrom nor other company officials have said why the change in leadership occurred. Fagerstrom is also a former board member.

Sobocienski’s departure from the board does not change its leadership structure. Crystal Andersen-Booth remains board chair, Neal Foster is first vice chair, Wendell (Mike) Wassmann is second vice chair, Jeannie Yuman is treasurer and Janice Doherty is secretary. Other board members are Homer Hoogendorn, Andrew Miller Jr., Jacob Ahwinona, Helen Bell and Perry Mendenhall.

Sitnasuak is accepting letters of intent and filled-out nominee information questionnaires until Aug. 21. The questionnaire can be obtained at the corporation’s office next to Bonanza Express off Bering Street.

It’s Worse Than the Party Line

Last week the US Senate approved Sonia Sotomayor’s nomination to the Supreme Court. Alaska Senator Lisa Murkowski voted against Sotomayor’s appointment. Not only did she hold to party lines, but she also went around the bend with her explanation. Perhaps we could understand Murkowski’s reluctance to vote for a liberal, but her reasons sounded like she was channeling Sarah Palin. However, even Palin wouldn’t have been so venomous.

Murkowski went on a rant against East Coast people who were educated in East Coast liberal universities who just don’t understand Alaskans and our love of assault rifles. Let’s let that cool off a bit. Where does the Murkowski family live? Isn’t it Washington, D.C.? Isn’t that someplace east of the Mississippi River? Did she get a liberal education? Why do the Republicans always have to crank out half-cocked fears of gun legislation? Who are they trying to scare? Why such a diatribe against liberals in the name of Alaskans? Some Alaskans are proud of being raised on the East Coast, and some of us are proud of being educated at an East Coast university which is probably less liberal than a West Coast university. Yes, some Alaskans are liberals but more are moderates and a lot are even Democrats. However, the conservatives don’t seem to know the difference.

Senator Murkowski should know better than to take such a cheap shot in the name of Alaskans. This is a time when our nation can do without such divisive comments. The old party line routine is understandable for an old party line thinker, but the vindictiveness against East Coast liberals is strange. How do they differ from West Coast liberals? Such narrow-minded comments from an Alaska senator are quite disturbing. Maybe Senator Murkowski can fire her speechwriter, but she really needs to broaden her vision. — N.L.M. —

2009 Arctic Economic Development Summit What does it take to start a business? By Jason Evans

These owners brought up the three most important items when starting a business. 1. Save money prior to starting your business. 2. Have enough savings to survive until your business can support your family. 3. Keep your accounting straight and pay your taxes. If you take these three steps, it does not matter what type of business you start, you will be more likely to succeed.

I recently moderated a panel of private business owner from across the arctic at the 2009 Arctic Economic Development Summit held in Point Hope last month. The conference is a joint production put on by the Northwest Arctic Borough and the North Slope Borough and goes for several days on topics ranging from Small Business to Resource Development to Partnering with the State and Federal Government. The theme of the conference was Two Regions, One People, No Boundaries.

A few of the business owners I worked with were FBX, the largest freight handler based in Kotzebue; Morris Trading, a 50-year-old grocery store in Noorvik, and Aarigaa Java, the northern most espresso drive through in the world based in Barrow.

Each person gave personal accounts of what it took to start, run and operate their businesses in rural Alaska. Most of them were nervous to talk to the crowd of 200 plus people filling the Point Hope school gym and the hundreds more on the radio, but they had the crowd captivated with telling stories on the small details and nuances of running a business.

Olanan Rexford, the owner of Aarigaa Java talked about saving his Native Corporation and Alaska PFD dividends for several years as he planned to start his business. “We sacrificed for our future” he told the crowd. Rexford also added starting a business makes your prioritize what you do with your money.

Morris Trading Company was started more than 50 years ago by Minnie Morris and her husband. She said they wanted to start a small store by selling candy bars, but she added they had independent income from outside employment. They used all of the profits to grow the company for several years before using or depending on any of the profits. Now they are one of the largest village based stores in the Northwest region.

Marcy Fairbanks from FBX said “the most important parts of running a business is bookkeeping and paying your taxes”. Fairbanks said, “Taxes always need to be paid; you might bring cash in today and you must put it aside to pay taxes in the future.”

YES VOTE—Nome Sen. Donnie Olson takes a break during the Aug. 10 special joint session of the Alaska Legislature. Olson gave a “yes” vote to override former Gov. Sarah Palin’s veto which refused to accept $28 million in federal energy stimulus funds.

Legislature nixes Palin’s veto on energy funds

By Diana Haecker
When the state legislature convened for a special session Aug. 10 at the Egan Center in Anchorage, the senators and representatives had to navigate a crowd of protesters loudly demanding a “no” vote.
Protesters waved signs and took over the sidewalk in front of the Egan Center on Fifth Avenue, thumping “No” signs in the legislators’ faces. Some of them stopped to look at the signs that read, “WE the people say NO,” “Sovereignty yes, slush funds no,” “Do not sell us out for $28 mil!” One man wore a T-shirt depicting former Gov. Sarah Palin and the words, “Sarah, we still love you.”
Other legislators, visibly annoyed, walked by and into the building to the chorus of “Vote no, vote no, vote no.”

Demonstrators on the other side of the issue quietly held their signs up, showing support for “Energy funds AK jobs” or “Efficiency makes cents.”
A few hours later, the House and Senate voted in a 45-14 vote to override former Palin’s veto to accept $28.6 million in federal energy stimulus funds. It was a close affair, as the law requires a 75 percent vote to override a governor’s veto. The money is meant to weatherize homes and invest in energy-efficient projects. Palin rejected the funds in May on the grounds that they would come with strings attached. She asserted that these strings would allow the “feds” to dictate energy efficient building standards on Alaskan cities and communities. A third of the Senate and a third of the House representatives spoke their minds, and did so mostly in favor of overriding the veto.

The ensuing debate Aug. 10 centered on whether or not the strings are a myth or reality. Senator and resource committee co-chair Bill Wielechowski (D-Anchorage) said that in his travels around Alaska, he had heard pleas for help from Alaskans. Regarding the assertion that in return for the $28.6 million, the state has to adopt or impose energy-efficient building standards, Wielechowski said that after seeking the Department of Energy’s clarification, the energy department sent a letter to Alaska legislators to confirm that Alaska does not have to “adopt, impose or enforce a statewide building proficient. Despite being well under the state's bar, which is set at 77 percent for last year, the improvement was enough to pass under a provision the state calls "safe harbor."

That same provision allowed subsets of the school's population to make AYP in certain categories. Economically disadvantaged students, which account for the majority of the elementary school's population, scored proficient in language. Two years ago, that segment did not make AYP in language, with only 48 percent scoring proficient. In the most recent school year, 55 percent of the economically disadvantaged students scored proficient, allowing the district to make AYP under the safe harbor provision.

In the area of math, the elementary school overall remained relatively flat, dropping slightly from 55 percent scoring proficient two years ago to 54 percent last year. Overall, the school did not make AYP in that category. Again the school saw a jump in the scores of economically disadvantaged students—to 55 percent proficient from 48 percent before—earning it AYP for that segment due to the safe harbor provision. "I'm particularly encouraged at where the economically disadvantaged cohorts posted in each building, [Nome-Beltz and the elementary]," Wehde said.

Wehde expects the trend of improving scores to continue. "Over the last three years, we've been gathering up more of our marginal students and moving them across the line," he said. "That's where the majority of our Nome Elementary kids reside...they are near misses."

Wehde says the improvements are not happenstance. "We're working proficient. Two years ago, through the safe harbor provision, it made the grade in math with 52 percent testing proficient. Last year only 51 percent scored proficient, causing the school to not meet AYP. In language, however, 58 percent scored proficient last year, marking a large enough improvement over the 56 percent from two years ago to grant the school safe harbor AYP.

The high school's graduation rate also showed an uptick with 71.4 percent receiving diplomas last year compared to 67 percent the year before.

While making AYP under the current guidelines has proved unattainable for Nome's two largest schools, the effort is made even more difficult each year as the standards become more stringent. Like running a race where the finish line keeps getting extended farther down the course, the percentage of students who must score proficient keeps getting increased over time.

At the dawning of the No Child Left Behind Act, 64 percent of students had to score proficient in language and nearly 55 percent had to do so in math. This school year, like last year, the numbers are 77 percent for language and 66 percent for math. For the 2010-2011 school year, the percentages jump to nearly 83 percent for language and 74 percent for math. By 2013, 100 percent of students are required to score proficient for a school to make AYP.

Bering Strait schools see mixed results

With 15 schools in its widespread district, the Bering Strait School District experienced a variety of results from the state testing. Approximately half of the district's schools made the grade, while those that fell short trailed the state's standards at varying levels. Making AYP were the Anthony A.

gion not making AYP are by far no anomaly in the state. Of the state's 505 schools, 224 did not make the grade for 2008-2009. The list of schools not making AYP covers both urban and rural parts of the state.

Goals and consequences

Each year that a school does not make AYP causes it to drop another rung in the level ranking until it hits level 5. With those levels comes consequences under the No Child Left Behind Act.

In the initial levels, the requirements call for developing and implementing a school improvement plan. Parents are notified of the school's ranking. As the schools drop deeper into the level system, the schools are required to offer parents the choice of another school or supplemental education services if another school is not available. Some of the consequences of hitting and remaining at level 5 sound nearly draconian. At their most severe, the rules can call for the removal and replacement of a school's teachers and the operation of the facility turned over to a management company or the state.

Nome Superintendent Wehde said such extreme measures are not feasible and unlikely in rural Alaska where staffing can be a challenge. "Am I expecting any overt consequences from the state, no," he said. "We're still functioning at a status where we're making changes in our infrastructure."

It is unknown currently what the state may ask of the area schools remaining at level five.

For Nome's schools, he said the state in past years has performed a "desk audit" process which has involved a thorough review of the improvement plans written for the elementary and junior/senior high schools as well as other areas of their operation. "They're going to compare where we came from, what kind of growth we've had, and then go down and see what we placed in our school improvement plans," he said.

Some districts have experienced more direct involvement from the state. "There are a handful of districts where the state has intervened and put a state specialist on site," Wehde said. "The state is there to support us and monitor us."

Coming on the heels of the report, Wehde said the district is entering the coming school year with a new philosophy. "We're going to make this the year of the individual," he said.

Wehde said that philosophy applies to a number of areas, be it students, parents or teachers. He said one of the benefits of the annual testing and the No Child Left Behind Act is that the district now has seven years of data on its students which can help target educational efforts to better serve each student. That work will fall on the teachers as well as parents, he said. "We have the ability now to coach parents critically with homework," he said.

As the new school year gets underway, Wehde said the schools will focus on the work which needs to be done to move the test scores more in line with where the state wants to see them. He also said that improvement will not come at the expense of the elements of school that round out a student's experience and make them want to come back each day. "There's a lot of work to do, but we want to do it in such a fashion that it doesn't extinguish the love of learning," he said.

with students who are just missing by inches. We were missing by miles seven years ago," he said. "It's a reason to be encouraged. Now we know we're heading in the right direction. The programs made over the last few years are beginning to bear fruit." Wehde said those efforts include summer school and bringing on extra staff at the elementary school to target students who need more help.

Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High saw a flip in areas where it was deemed Andrews School in St. Michael, James C. Isabell School in Teller, Koyuk-Malemute School, Martin L. Olson School in Golovin, Shishmaref School, Unalakleet School and White Mountain School.

The schools in Elim, Brevig Mission, Diomedes, Gambell, Savoonga, Shaktoolik, Stebbins and Wales did not make AYP for the last school year. Of those, Elim, Gambell, Savoonga and Stebbins were at a level 5.

Flu Season Preparedness

The City of Nome Local Emergency Planning Committee (LEPC) has monitored the status of the swine flu (H1N1) influenza outbreak since April. At the start of the summer, the LEPC in cooperation with Norton Sound Health Corporation mailed brochures to every box holder in Nome and the Bering Straits Region. The information contained in these brochures is still up to date.

Since school will be starting in a few weeks, you may be wondering what you can do to help curtail the rapid spread of influenza during the upcoming flu season.

- Wash your hands frequently with warm water and soap for 15-30 seconds or use hand sanitizer.
- Cover your mouth and nose when you cough and sneeze, then wash your hands if your hands were used.
- Stay at home when you are sick, and keep your children at home if they are sick. Don't go to work or send your children to school or public areas when you or our children are sick.
- Don't touch your nose, mouth or eyes with your hands; if you do, wash your hands.
- Avoid hugging, shaking hands or kissing others if you or the other person is ill.
- If you are ill with flu-like symptoms, which include coughing, sneezing, body aches, fever, headaches and chills, contact your local health clinic for instructions and possibly an appointment.
- Be prepared for the flu season by following the guidelines provided in the brochure you received in May regarding H1N1. Additional brochures are available at City Hall and Public Health Nursing.

The Nome Volunteer Ambulance Department will be wearing masks on all calls for training purposes and to increase public awareness for H1N1.

According to a report published July 30 in The Nome Nugget, Alaska Gold Co. needs to dispose of more than 130 million gallons of treated tailings water currently stored in a large pond at the Rock Creek Mine several miles north of Nome. The company proposes to carry the water through a heat-traced and insulated pipeline over the tundra to the sewage lagoon. From there it would be piped to the Bering Sea.

Mining permit approved

The council adopted a resolution to issue a permit to Mitch Erickson for the 2009 mining season. The permit allows Erickson or his agent, Lawrence Essad, to operate a gravel spoils pile removal operation within the Moonlight Wells Protection area from which Nome draws its drinking water.

"The permit application covers stockpiling and screening of gravels for a future commercial materials site," the permit reads. "This permit does not include processing gravels for ore and establishment of waste facilities, holding ponds, etc., as part of any ore extraction activities."

The Acting City Engineer, Bristol Environmental & Engineering Services, reviewed the application and prepared a draft Moonlight Wells Permit based upon Best Management Practices, the resolution states.

The permit stipulates the following BMP for depth of cuts for gravel spoils pile removal: "The proposed gravel removal activity is within 750 feet of the Moonlight Wells well house. The proposed gravel spoils pile removal work shall be conducted so that there is no excavation into natural ground, and that only the spoil piles on top will be removed. There should be close monitoring of the gravel removal activities; if the gravels extracted include natural ground—the removal excavation should stop..."

The draft permit was made available for public comment from July 20 to Aug. 6. The city received no written comments about the proposed permit, and the council received no comments at the public hearing prior to approving the permit.

Councilman Stan Andersen asked Erickson what materials he plans to remove from the site. Erickson said the materials are 200,000 yards of tailings piles from the Gold Rush era.

"The permit says you can't go through natural ground," Anderson noted.

"It's 100 percent mine tailings from previous years," Erickson replied. "No [natural] ground will be disturbed."

Knodel asked Public Works Director Bill Angus whether he had inspected the permit site. "Yes," Angus said. "There is no existing machinery or anything out there at all."

Other council actions

Following a public hearing on an ordinance to issue a land use permit to the Nome Sportsman Association for the Sunset Firing Range, the council approved minor amendments to the ordinance and then adopted it as amended. Erickson, Jeff Darling and Keith Conger made comments in favor of the ordinance during the public hearing. No one spoke in opposition to the permit.

The Sunset Firing Range contains about 43 acres and is located at mile 9 of the Nome-Teller Highway. The Nome Sportsman Association will use the range to provide hunter safety training for the community, and recreational and competitive shotgun, rifle, pistol and archery shooting activities.

The city agreed to allow the association non-exclusive use of the range for a two-year period from Aug. 11, 2009 through June 30, 2011 for a fee of $1.

The council adopted a resolution designating water and sewer infrastructure improvements, specifically the replacement and expansion of the scialcore system in the east quadrant of Nome, as the community's No. 1 local state funding priority for 2010.

Nome DVD wins Emmy

"There's No Place Like Nome," a DVD produced by the Nome Convention and Visitor's Bureau, won a 2009 Emmy Award for Cinematography, reports NCVB Director Mitch Erickson. He said the award was presented to Richard Cooper, producer and director of photography for the video, by the Northwest Chapter of the National Academy of Television Arts and Science in June. Richard Beneville was casting and creative director for the video, and Erickson was one of the executive producers.

In a written report to City Manager Josie Bahnke and the council, Erickson noted a decline in tourism in interior Alaska and in Nome this summer.

"Locally, one hotel property stated they are down 20 percent from last year," he wrote. "Several birding tours either cancelled or combined packages, and the independents have cancelled due to the economy. One tour company reports business down by 25 percent. The majority of the business decline is family members not coming to Nome to visit relatives. We had anticipated seven cruise ships coming to Nome this summer. Two have since cancelled and the two cruise ships that have stopped in Nome, the Spirit of Oceanus and the Clipper Odyssey, sailed at occupancy levels of 72 percent and 64 percent, respectively. Total cruise passengers were around 312."

Erickson said the NVCB is advertising for a new tourism director with extensive knowledge of Nome and the Bering Strait region. "Our new website, www.visitnomealaska.com, is now online but still undergoing some final edits, updates and modifications," he said.

Upcoming election

Nome resident Tim Smith reminded council members that the Nome seat on the Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. board of directors will be up for election this October. Nome is one of NSEDC's 15 member communities.

Smith provided each council member with a copy of a judgment issued Dec. 6, 1994 by the state Superior Court, Second Judicial District at Nome in a civil case Smith brought against NSEDC. The judgment included three options from which voters chose the following method for selecting an NSEDC representative from their community: "2) Election at a regularly held municipal election by anyone residing in the community who is eligible to vote in a municipal election."

"Remember the problem with the 2006 election," Smith said. "It's important to clear up the rules well ahead of the 2009 election." He said the provisions in the 1994 court judgment for electing representatives of NSEDC's member communities still stand.

In the 2006 election for the NSEDC Nome representative, Adem Boeckmann garnered the most votes, followed by Louis Green Jr. Boeckmann, however, was disqualified because he resides outside Nome's municipal boundaries. Smith and Green are among those who believe the election should have been awarded to Green as the next highest vote-getter.

However, in a complex series of actions, the 2006 election for Nome's NSEDC board member was nullified. Nome's incumbent NSEDC board member Don Stiles, who had decided not to run in the 2006 election, continued to serve in that capacity while the company arranged for a second election. Stiles ran in the second election in February 2007 and defeated Green. Then the NSEDC board changed the company's bylaws to allow individuals who reside outside the municipal boundaries of a community to run in an election for that community's board seat.

Mayor Denise Michels told Smith Aug. 10 the city had received a letter with proposed changes from NSEDC's Chief Executive Officer Janis Ivanoff and had forwarded it to the city's attorney. "They did make bylaws changes," Michels said.

"Their bylaws don't control the election," Smith replied. "It's still under the court judgment."

City Clerk Sandy Sturgis-Babcock asked Smith to clarify a comment he made to her in an earlier conversation about the eligibility of a candidate and the eligibility of a voter. Smith said the same rules apply to the election of NSEDC board members that apply to the election of Nome Joint Utility System board members.

Michels said a copy of the document Smith provided to council members will be faxed to the city's attorney for review.

All members of the council were present at the Monday meeting except for Neal Foster.

Floodplain study meeting

A public meeting to review the City of Nome's floodplain study is scheduled Aug. 26 from 5 p.m. to 6:30 p.m. at the City Council Chambers, according to Michael J. Riedy, floodplain management specialist for the Federal Emergency Management Agency. This will be the final Flood Insurance Community Coordination Officer meeting for the study.

Results of the new Flood Insurance Study and Preliminary Flood Insurance Rate Maps, dated Oct. 31, 2008, will be presented. The study is the primary tool used under the National Flood Insurance Program and insurance industry to regulate floodplain development and rate flood insurance policies.

Planners approve little Darling

By Sandra L. Medearis

City planners have given a preliminary nod to a small subdivision south of the Nome-Beltz school complex.

The bulk of Darling Creek Subdivision would lay west of Center Creek Road and north of Anvil Mountain Correctional Center. The land is owned by NovaGold Resources.

The subdivision qualifies for an abbreviated plat procedure, meaning after it has been surveyed and a final plat drawn up, it can go directly to City Hall for approval, without stopping at the Nome Planning Commission table for approval. The action separates a 6.25-acre lot from remaining Parcel A-1 of more than 100 acres. The smaller piece, at 6.25 acres, lies across the road from the correctional center.

The panel waived the planning commission review at its Aug. 4 meeting, pending a percolation test and correction of typos on the documents. According to surveyor George Krier, the shortcut was legal because the subdivision met five requirements: lots five acres or larger, legal and physical access to public street or highway for each lot, single lot subdivided into no more than four lots, does not require any street right-of-way issues, and does not require vacation of public land or variance from subdivision regulations. Krier attended by telephone.

A "percolation test" determines the rate of absorption by soil for a septic drain field onsite.

In other business, the commission decided to keep the same officers for another year. Irene Anderson was retained as chairwoman.

grant from $1.3 million to $1 million.

NSEDC's 2008 budget does not include monies for the UVEC project, so Harrelson asked Ivanoff how the grant would be funded. She said the money would come from one of the company's escrow accounts.

On July 30 during a meeting of the full board, Harrelson said the executive committee had discussed a community energy fund proposal prepared by staff, adding that the funds could be used for a feasibility study, not just an alternative energy project. He said the committee had taken no action on the proposal and recommended that the full board review it.

Stiles asked that a resolution be drafted for consideration by the board during the July meeting to establish an energy fund of $1 million for each community. The next day the board approved Stiles' motion to adopt the resolution based on the staff's proposal. Stiles thanked the board and staff for creating the community energy fund to offset high energy costs and help solve economic woes. "...I look forward to the energy problem being smashed," he added.

Golovin rock quarry study

The Golovin Native Corp. submitted a proposal to the NSEDC board requesting $206,000 to conduct the first phase of a feasibility study for a rock quarry. Golovin board member Dean Peterson said development of the quarry would create jobs in the community. He introduced Peter Olson of GNC to the board, noting that Olson has worked on the proposed project since it began.

Olson said GNC had an engineer and geologist look at the proposed rock quarry in 2005 and hired an engineer from URS Corp. for a feasibility study in 2006. URS will conduct a full feasibility study and develop a business plan for the project, which will cost $1.14 million before the first dirt is turned, he added.

Olson said GNC, which has contributed $28,000 for the study, hopes to complete the first eight tasks for $235,505. The rock at the proposed quarry site located 1.5 miles east of Golovin on land owned by GNC is of higher grade and harder than rock from Cape Nome, he said. Olson said Kawerak has told GNC it will contribute up to $120,000 for the study.

Harrelson said Golovin and White Mountain hope to establish a wind turbine system between the two communities to provide energy to both of them. "A gravel source at Golovin would give us a good road to it," he added. "Golovin is threatened by global warming and a rock quarry would help [the community] build a wall."

"For erosion control, yes," Olson said.

Harvey Sookiayak of Shaktoolik made a motion to approve the GNC funding request, seconded by Fred Katcheak of Unalakleet.

"I appreciate their work on this," Stiles said. "I recognize it's out of [the budget] cycle." He said he is supporting the request, but he asked board members not to get into the habit of making funding requests outside the budget cycle.

"The timing is critical," Harrelson replied.

Stiles asked where funding for the request will come from in the budget.

"A budget amendment is needed," Ivanoff said.

The board unanimously approved the GNC funding request for $206,000.

Port Clarence test fishery

Board members reviewed a proposal developed for a test fishery this summer in the Port Clarence and Teller areas by Charlie Lean, NSEDC's director of Fisheries Research and Development.

Ivanoff and Simon Kinneen, NSEDC's chief operating officer, emphasized that the proposed test fishery is a minor part of a feasibility study approved by the board at their April meeting to help residents of Brevig Mission, Little Diomedes, Teller and Wales become Bering Sea fishermen.

Lean said he has ordered 15 sets of long line gear, part of which will be distributed among Teller and Brevig Mission fishermen to fish for halibut, cod and pollock. He suggested fishing from small boats near shore at Port Clarence and the entrance to Grantley Harbor. Lean said he is trying to arrange for a couple of charter trips for trainees farther out in the Bering Sea with experienced fishermen who own 30-foot boats.

"To catch halibut you need an Internet-connected buying station," he noted. "We have one at Savoonga and Unalakleet." He said it's not practical to go from Teller to Nome with the catch, so the test fishery needs to be a subsistence fishery.

Lean said he has budgeted $37,000 to pay for long line gear, charter trips, $100 for each fisherman to help with gas costs, and a global positioning system for each of them. Fishers who participate in the test fishery can keep the long line gear and the fish they catch in exchange for providing data on the location and species of fish harvested, he added.

"We live in an economically depressed area where two families together own a boat," said board member Joe Garnie of Teller. "One boat might take a trip in a day to a berry area. I doubt if they will give a boat to one or two individuals in the family to [use in a test fishery]. So I see it as a failure for lack of outboards and boats."

"It may be a better incentive to pay these guys to go to work," Harrelson said. "Will our insurance cover them on a charter boat? Will wages attract good guys?"

"Yes, we have some guys who have fished in Nome," Garnie replied. "There are not enough boats to go around in the community."

Lean said a Nome fisherman has offered to bring his skiff to Teller to fish with local residents. "I chose the subsistence route to avoid legal problems," he noted. Lean explained that commercially harvested halibut must get to Nome for processing in the same boat in which it was caught.

"We are mostly interested in the halibut fishery," said board member Reggie Barr of Brevig Mission.

"We're between a rock and a hard spot," Garnie said. "I'm more than grateful, but we have no boats. I see megabucks poured into [NSEDC's processing] plants. I'm literally going to ask you for boats and motors.... I see tenders and thousands and thousands of dollars for the southern communities and nothing for the northern communities."

Stiles said the only thing to do is buy the boats. He said the boats should be longer than 18 feet, and he suggested buying 22-foot salmon skiffs.

"If we use them in the test fishery and then make them available through the loan program," Harrelson said. NSEDC provides a revolving loan program for fishermen to buy boats, motors, nets and other gear.

"We have two very nice trailers NSEDC gave Teller, and a loader," Garnie said, adding that the trailers and loader need minor repairs.

"We have an existing boat loan [program]," noted board member Charles Saccheus of Elim. "Why don't they go through the same process just like other fishing villages?"

"We want to be sure enough fish are there to pay off a loan," Harrelson said. "I'd hate to buy a $30,000 boat and then find no fish."

Stiles made a motion to buy four vessels for the Port Clarence fishery at a cost of $25,000 for each vessel. The motion was amended to add Lean's $37,000 budget for the fishery, and the board approved the motion as amended for $137,000.

"Do you need a budget amendment?" Sookiayak asked Lean. "Yes," Lean replied, adding that he is not sure how soon he can get the boats to Nome.

In answer to a question from Harrelson, Lean said the boats will be shared in the communities.

code” to qualify for the energy stimulus money. All that is asked for in return is that the state promotes cities and communities to adopt their own energy efficiency codes. Wielechowski said that the only strings in his interpretation of the letter are “responsibility and accountability.”

“In fact, 92 percent of Alaskans already live in communities that have adopted international energy efficiency building codes,” Wielechowski said.

Rep. Bryce Edgmon (D-Dillingham) pointed out that the weatherization program is an immediate way to save on energy and that the stimulus money could supply “badly needed funds for the Renewable Energy Alaska Project.” Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Haines) added that nobody talks about federal highway funds that are spent in Alaska despite the fact that there are numerous strings attached to those.

Sen. Lyman Hoffman (D-Bethel) added that Alaskans live in the coldest state in the union and that “we should be setting the standards in weatherization.”

On the other side of the aisle, politicians still believe in the imposition of building standards and insisted that acceptance of the energy stimulus funds would authorize feds to tell Alaskans how to build homes and public facilities. Rep. Wes Keller (R-Wasilla) asserted that acceptance of the money is going to ride the state deep into trouble. “It’s a lot of money, but we don’t want to walk into it because it will cost the state more money to walk into codes that haven’t even been written yet,” Keller said.

North Pole Republican Sen. John Coghill prophesied, “We will see more building codes that follow this money to Alaska.” He added that the Department of Energy and the language in the stimulus bill itself are sending conflicting messages and that there would be way too much federal control already. “In fact, I will be turning up my nose on more federal money,” Coghill announced.

The most fiery opposition speech on the floor came from Bob Lynn (R-Anchorage), who said that he, too, could not make sense out of the conflicting messages “from our friends in Washington.” Lynn said with his “no” vote, he wants to send a message to U.S. Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi “to keep your hands off and leave it up to us to figure out how we do things in Alaska.”

Anchorage Democrat Les Gara expressed his frustration with the former administration under Palin and that he did not get any answers out of the governor’s office when asking for what specific strings Palin took offense to. Gara said that he had wished for an informed discussion with the executive rather than the reverting to “generalities.”

“Every single statement out of the governor’s office was a generality about the governor not wanting the feds to tell Alaska what to do,” he said.

Gara said energy efficient building and the money saved is the “single least expensive way to reduce energy costs.” But then there were those who changed their minds. Anchorage Republican Mike Hawker said he had initially been an outspoken critic of the energy stimulus money. “But my opinion has evolved,” he said. Hawker said that his office did thorough research and demystified the myth that the state has to adopt or impose building codes. Another legislator referred to the letter out of DoE as being written by a low-level bureaucrat, but Hawker said that the letter went through the entire DoE legal review process and has been OK’d by the general legal counsel for the Department of Energy.

Sen. Bob Herron (D-Bethel) simply said that his constituents have urged a “yes” vote. “I guess we should thank Gov. Palin for this veto because it brought a high level of intensity to this debate,” Herron said. He added that a few hours earlier, as he walked into the building, he witnessed a woman with a big “No” sign pestering a legislator to vote “no.” “She didn’t know that he will vote no, but I appreciate her passion about it,” he said.

Finally, Sen. Lesil McGuire, an Anchorage Republican and co-chair of the Senate’s Resource Committee, said that she understands the Republicans’ fear and skepticism of government. “But, having that said, I also want to point out that we work in partnership with the feds,” McGuire said.

Park Rangers bring love of plants and animals to children

By Anna Hahn

Junior Rangers and Tundra Tots are the focus point of Rachel Gabryszak, a student from Buffalo State in New York.

Originally her college major was going to center on social work — but when Gabryszak applied for an intern position with Nome's Park Ranger Service, her plans took a 180° turn.

Now she is changing her major to conservation work, all because of her one summer in Nome.

"It's glorious in Nome—it kind of pulls you in... Now I want to spend all of my time outside. I want to work outside and stay out," said Gabryszak.

The programs Junior Rangers and Tundra Tots provide sessions for young children who wish to learn about the environment and animals.

Gabryszak leads the two weekly sessions.

For Tundra Tots, the younger group, Gabryszak provides different craft projects, songs and education on how different animals eat and keep warm.

When it comes to Junior Rangers, the older kids, the crafts may take more time and the animal and plant learning is more in depth.

Gabryszak will return to Buffalo State on the Aug. 17 and says she would love to return to Nome in the future.

As for Tundra Tots and Junior Rangers, a different intern will take Gabryszak's place next summer and continue with the program's educational outreach and hands-on learning.

Someday they will go to Mars

More than a dozen young Nomeites sent their gazes skyward Aug. 7, launching model rockets toward the stratosphere for DAWN's second annual rocket day. DAWN, Drugs Aren't Wanted in Nome, sponsored the follow-up event to last year's launch. With the help of Anvil City Science Academy teacher Todd Hindman, 16 participants built and launched their own rockets. The young rocketeers spent the first part of the day custom building each rocket.

After the glue dried, they put the engines in place and headed to the field east of the Nome Recreation Center. Some of the crafts soared 500 feet into the air. Some were taken by the wind when the chute deployed, and some went up and tumbled straight back down. After the launch, the rocketeers enjoyed ice cream sundaes and shared stories of their particular

and the Halloween Happening.

The organization also supports other local youth activities with financial assistance.

Nome man found dead in home

No foul play suspected

A pair of visitors discovered a Nome resident dead in his home Saturday evening.

The discovery of Albert Kenneth Kowchee, 65, at 312 West 1st Ave. prompted the two acquaintances to call the Nome Police Department Aug. 8. Police say a subsequent investigation that lasted several hours revealed no indication of foul play. The results of the investigation were shared with the state Medical Examiner's Office, which, police say, determined no autopsy was necessary.

Next of kin have been notified.

Saying it Sincerely

By Rev. David Elmore
Community United Methodist Church
For the Nome Ministerial Association
Reference: John 6: 35, 41-51

In the 1985 film, Back to the Future II, Marty McFly and Dr. Emmett Brown travel ahead in time to 2015. In this movie we see a view of 2015 complete with flying cars and hoverboards – skateboards that hover rather than roll. When there, Marty sees his future family in ruins, and decides to buy a sports almanac and take it back with him to 1985 and make a fortune on betting on sports events. Now Doc Brown, eccentric though he may be, is no dummy and he catches wind of this and throws the almanac away, uttering the memorable line, “I didn’t invent the time machine to win at gambling, . . . I invented the time machine to travel through time.” Anyway, Biff, Marty’s nemesis, gets wind of this, steals the time machine and takes the almanac back to 1954 and alters history, building a fortune from betting on sports and making the idyllic community of Hill Valley a gambling Mecca.

When Marty and Doc Brown returned from the future, they brought a new reality back with them. A reality created by Biff bringing that almanac back to 1955 and using it to acquire great wealth such that he came to control Hill Valley. Marty and Doc Brown longed for things to return to the idyllic community that Hill Valley was before Biff changed things by sneaking that Almanac

There are parallels here with John’s understanding of Eternal Life. The Hebrew understanding of eternal life was that it was “life of the age which is to come.” We understand that to be the life when Jesus returns, or the life in the Kingdom of God. Now, we understand that when Jesus walked among us, the Kingdom of God has come near to us. But, we know that it is not complete. We still have suffering and evil in the world. There are too many Biffs in this world who seek to get rich at the expense of others. But, Jesus teaches us that He is the bread of life, and through trusting him, through eating the bread and drinking the cup, through resting and praying at Jesus’ feet, we may experience eternal life, or life with God. Just as God fed the Hebrews in the Desert as they were leaving slavery in Egypt by providing manna, God still provides for us as we seek the Christ, who reconciles us with God that we may have eternal life. Now, the relation to back to the future is this: Christ’s coming kingdom is both a present and future reality. Much like Marty tried to bring that almanac back, and just as Biff did, when we become part of Christ’s body, the church, we begin to experience that future reality as a present reality. But as we live out this new reality of God’s Reign, or eternal life, we are changed and we become more concerned about the least of these more than we do ourselves.

Obituaries

Tommy Johnson
2/14/24-7/30/09

Tommy (Thomas John) Johnson died July 30 at age 85 at the assisted living home, All About Care, in Anchorage. Tommy was born on Valentine’s Day, February 14, 1924 in Kinak, in the Kuskokwim area to John and Paniony Johnson. Celebration of Life is planned for August 28, starting at 2:30 p.m. at the Nome Rec. Center

Tommy’s father John came to Alaska from Trondhiem, Norway in 1882, and became a U.S. citizen in 1892. During the Klondike Gold Rush, John earned the nickname “Klondike”. Everybody called him that, as Tommy’s bother Dan recalls. John settled in Bristol Bay to fish. Tommy’s Mother, Paniony was from Nelson Island. Tommy was their third son. Paniony died after the birth of Tommy’s younger brother Andrew. John did his best to fish and raise his four sons. John had an 80 head reindeer herd and built sailboats. In the mid 1920s a sailboat was all folks could use to fish in Bristol Bay; motor boats were outlawed. John placed his four boys in the Moravian Children’s Home in Kwethluk near Bethel when John became too sick. He died from stomach cancer in Seward.

At 16 years of age Tommy left the orphanage with a limited education and total knowledge of the Bible. In 1939 he became a deck hand on the ship Moravian that carried freight around Alaska. That same year he was hired as a laborer and helped build the hospital in Dillingham. He would fish every summer on Bristol Bay out of Clarks Point. He was drafted in 1942 and served in the U.S. Army in the Aleutian Islands. Morris & Knudson hired him in 1946 and he became a member of The International Union of Operating Engineers, LOCAL 302. He worked in Fairbanks and around Alaska until 1955 when he moved to Nome with the White Alice project.

He married Myrtle Fagerstrom Chambers on Feb. 11, 1956 in Anchorage with his brother Dan and wife Goldie as witnesses. They had two sons, “Echo” in 1956 and Jack in 1959. He also helped raise Myrtle’s four children, Fritz, Lynn, Ann and Jo.

Tommy joined the Nome Volunteer Fire Department in 1957, served many years and continued to actively support the volunteers after he retired. Through the years he served on the Nome Joint Utility Board, Nome City Council, Bering Straits Native Corp. Board, Bering Straits Credit Union Board, and the Alaska State Commission for Human Rights.

He was made an agent for Operating Engineers Local 302 in 1976. He was a Field Representative for the Local 302 in the areas of Nome, Yukon, Bethel, Kotzebue, Lisburne and the North Slope.

His son “Echo” was nicknamed because he was an exact reflection of Tommy. From birth he was Tommy’s double. Echo died in a hunting accident in 1972.

Grandson Carl Putman called Tommy “Dad”. Carl would go to Tommy over the years to help him through tough times. He especially remembers telling Tommy about the passing of his other Grandpa. Tommy asked him if he was “OK” very kindly and caring.

Every summer for more than fifty years Tommy would commercial fish out of Clark’s Point, in Bristol Bay. The name of his boats were “Echo”, “Echo II”, “Jackie II” and finally “Solid Gold”, which he took to Nome and converted to a crab boat. Often his boat would have the best catch of the season. His sons and wife were members of his crew.

He had hands-on training as a laborer, carpenter and heavy-duty mechanic. He learned fast and what he learned he taught others. Alaska Commissioner of Labor Click Bishop states that “Tommy was an advocate for pushing local hire in Nome and Alaska. He was a champion for teaching the young people hunting, fishing and working.”

Senator Ted Stevens was his lawyer in Fairbanks in the early 1950s and remained a close friend Tommy’s whole life. Senator Stevens would visit him in the assisted living home in Anchorage.

Mike Friborg, Operator’s Union worked closely with Tommy for many years.

Tommy is survived by his wife of 53 years, Myrtle Johnson of Anchorage, his brother and sister-in-law Dan and Goldie Johnson of Kenai, brother Andy “Klondike” Johnson of Anchorage, his son and his wife Jack and Carol Johnson of Nome, stepchildren: Fritz and Judi Chambers of California, Lynn Chambers of Anchorage, Ann and Gene Matthews of Utah, Jo Putman of Nome, Special Grandson Carl Putman of Nome, brother-in-law Jerry and Rose Fagerstrom of Minnesota, sisters-in-law Maggie Olson of Golovin and Doris Lincoln of Kotzebue, many more grandchildren and great-grandchildren, nieces and nephews.

Tommy was preceded in death by his father John (Klondike) Johnson

Walter Savok Outwater, Jr.

Anchorage resident Walter "Boysa" Savok Outwater Jr., 51, died July 24, from stomach and colon cancer at the Alaska Native Medical Center. Many family members provided support and encouraged him during his battle. During that time, he stated "I am ready to go."

A funeral service was held at noon August 6 at the Anchorage Friends Church. It began with a viewing and then a potluck.

Boysa was born in Koyuk on March 1, 1958, to Walter Emuk, Sr. and Ruth Keenock Outwater.

He loved the outdoors during all seasons. He was an avid crack-shot hunter and shared his catch unsparingly. Boating, mentoring and ice fishing were his joys. Boysa's great love for the outdoors led him to supply furs for clothing and hunting gear. He would often say, "My dad taught me everything I know."

His travels included the Yukon River, Norton Sound, Kotzebue Sound, Chugach Mountains and Cook Inlet, often encountering many dangerous situations. Living a subsistence lifestyle, he stated, "I eat the best of everything."

At age 17, Boysa was the youngest journeyman heavy equipment operator in the state, which took him throughout rural Alaska. He said, "You can take a level to all of my work." In between seasonal jobs, he attended the University of Alaska Fairbanks, where he received academic awards for his writings.

He could talk for hours about current events and the history of Alaska.

His family wrote: "Boysa spent many hours studying the Bible throughout his life, first with his parents, then on his own. At age 12 he interpreted in writing the entire book of Ecclesiastes to his own understanding. Recently he sought the meanings of several Books of the Bible, concentrating heavily on some. He also enjoyed singing with the Church Choir. Praise the Lord! We miss you already Boysa, thanks for loving us all. Love, your family."

Boysa is survived by his sisters and their husbands; Theresa Pierce, Loretta and Skip Cox, Evelyn's husband Robert MacNeven, Clara and Tom Varieur, Peggy and Tim Turner; Martha and partner Rahn Parker; brother Richard and Sandy Outwater; and many nieces, nephews, grandnieces and grandnephews.

In the background is Our lady of Lourdes Catholic Church. Buzek and several volunteers spent a week painting the inside walls of the church and cleaning other buildings on the site. The former mission was developed as an orphanage and boarding school following the 1918 Influenza Pandemic and operated until the early 1940s. It was added to the National Register of Historic Places in 1977.

of the right-of-way grant for the Pilgrim Hot Springs road issued April 4, 1985 by the U.S. Bureau of Land Management to the Alaska Dept. of Transportation.

The document describes the right-of-way as a road from mile 53.4 of the Nome-Taylor Road to Pilgrim Hot Springs. The road is 60 feet wide (30 feet centerline) and approximately 7.5 miles long containing approximately 55 acres. The right-of-way document says the road is necessary to facilitate development of Pilgrim Hot Springs.

"This right-of-way grant is for 20 years, with the right of renewal, unless it is relinquished, abandoned, terminated, or otherwise modified pursuant to the terms and conditions of this grant or of any applicable Federal law or regulation," the document states.

The BLM right-of-way grant for the road to the DOT expired in 2005. The Friends of Pilgrim Hot Springs are seeking to have it renewed. Members of the organization plan to hold a meeting in September when Tom Buzek, business administrator for the Catholic Diocese of Fairbanks is in Nome. The diocese owns Pilgrim Hot Springs.

Buzek spent a week at Pilgrim Hot Springs in late July, painting the inside of the church and cleaning other structures on the grounds with the help of Louie Green, Sr. and several volunteers.

NOME PUBLIC SCHOOL DISTRICT PUBLIC RELEASE FOR FREE AND REDUCED PRICE MEALS

The Nome Public School District provides free and reduced price meals to students under the National School Lunch Program. The program will become effective August 25, 2009.

Students from families whose income is at or below the guidelines shown are eligible for free or reduced price meals. To be considered for benefits, a lunch application or a Direct Certification Notification from Public Assistance must be submitted to the school office. Students who are identified as migrant, homeless or runaway are categorically eligible and do not need to fill out an application. Note: Medicaid and Denali Kid Care case numbers do not qualify for eligibility.

Application forms, application instructions and a letter to parents/guardians will be available by August 17, 2009 at the schools for early pick up and will also be sent home with each student on the first day of school.

To apply for free or reduced price meal benefits, households should fill out one application per family or complete the Direct Certification Notification from Public Assistance and return it to the school.

Students qualifying for meal benefits at the close of the 2008-2009 school year may continue to receive benefits for up to 30 operating days at the start of the 2009-2010 school year while a new application is being processed. All other students must bring their own lunch or lunch money in order to be served through the lunch program. Lunch prices are $3.00 at the Elementary School and $3.50 at the Jr./Sr. High School.

Please allow a period of up to 10 working days to process your application.

The Nome Public School District uses the information provided on the application for the purpose of determining meal benefits for the National School Lunch Program. The Title I Grant Program, the E-Rate Program, and other grant programs use lunch eligibility to determine funding. Submitting a completed application will assist Nome Public Schools in obtaining these funds for our schools.

For additional information, call the Nome Public Schools district office at (907) 443-2231.

In the operation of the child feeding programs, no child will be discriminated against because of race, gender, color, national origin, age or disability. If you believe you have been discriminated against, write immediately to the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, DC 20250.

Back to flu

Swine flu is here and expected to spread with school's start

By Tyler Rhodes

It was only a matter of time. The H1N1 flu, more commonly known by its initial moniker of "swine flu," has made its appearance in the Norton Sound region. "We've been expecting it for a long time," said Norton Sound Health Corp. Director of Public Nursing Chris Kilby. "The fact that it hadn't happened until now was more of a surprise." Kilby said the hospital is not identifying where the confirmed cases of flu were found, but noted that it has likely spread region-wide by now with cases numbering in the dozens. "Now that H1N1 is here, we would expect to see a surge," she said. That surge is likely to come as the region's children head back to school, gathering in confined spaces. "The state is saying expect a surge in cases once school starts," Kilby said. "It's normal to have a surge in respiratory illness once school starts." With that in mind, both the schools and the hospital are preparing to deal with the possibility of increased absences in the classroom and more patients in the waiting room. Both organizations are planning public awareness campaigns on how to avoid getting the flu and what to do if they or a family member do catch it. In the midst of all this preparation, Kilby noted that while people should be aware of the flu and how to avoid and deal with it, it should not be a cause for panic. "The best thing you can do right now is prevention, not panic," she said. Kilby said all the H1N1 flu cases in the region have been relatively mild. "The severity is essentially identical to the seasonal flu," she said. "We have not seen an increase in hospitalizations or death rates over the seasonal flu." In fact, Kilby said, it may be hard for those who contact the new strain to know whether or not they have the seasonal flu or the H1N1. The symptoms of the H1N1 flu include fever, cough, sore throat, body aches, headache, chills and fatigue. Some who have had the flu experienced vomiting, nausea or diarrhea, although Kilby said those symptoms are not as common. She also said it is possible to have both the H1N1 and seasonal flu at the same time. Nome Public Schools started its efforts to inform while students were still enjoying their last week of freedom. Teachers were given a presentation by Nome's Local Emergency Planning Committee Chair Tom Vaden on the flu and prevention measures during their in-service Aug. 18. Public Health Director Kilby said members of her staff have been and will continue to visit schools in the Bering Strait School Dis-

Seeking silvers

ADF&G report

The commercial catch of coho (silver) salmon in Norton Sound totaled nearly 52,000 fish as the run approached its midpoint on Aug. 14, according to preliminary figures released by Jim Menard, area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue for the Alaska Department of Fish and Game. Commercial fishermen in the Unalakleet subdistrict have caught the bulk of the harvest—37,650 silvers. Commercial fishing is open for two 48-hour periods a week in the Unalakleet, Shaktoolik, Moses Point and Golovin subdistricts. Last week commercial fishing was open for one 48-hour period in the Norton Bay subdistrict. The Norton Sound silver salmon run is average to above average, except in the Nome Subdistrict, where the run is well below average, Menard reports.

"The marine waters of the Nome subdistrict are open to subsistence fishing seven days a week," he said. "The fresh waters subsistence areas are open to subsistence gillnet fishing

Dear Editor,

Fair and open elections are the foundation of our form of government but elections have always been a problem for NSEDC. This week, NSEDC, as it did in 2006, will launch an election for its board of directors inconsistent with the rules governing NSEDC director elections.

The pattern of election abuse was established when NSEDC was transformed from an association whose membership was composed of individual local fishermen dedicated to developing a king salmon hatchery at Elim hot springs into an Anchorage based CDQ corporation whose only members are its 15 directors; in business with its partners in Seattle and Japan to convert tons of pollock into millions of dollars and in the process, kill and waste salmon as incidental bycatch.

During the summer of 1992, when the CDQ program first came along, NSEDC experienced an unlawful strong-arm takeover and all but one of the existing board of directors was replaced. The people who were NSEDC members prior to the takeover were no longer recognized as members. Members of the Nome Fishermen’s Association, a Nome City Council member and I began questioning NSEDC management and State of Alaska and federal CDQ program oversight about how the re-organized NSEDC would function; particularly how someone could join as a member and how a person could be elected to its board of directors. The answer was that they couldn’t, NSEDC no longer admitted members and it did not hold director elections. NSEDC managers later testified under oath that they did not know how board members were chosen.

It is no walk in the park to battle an organization that has millions of dollars and teams of lawyers to fight their battles for them, but NSEDC was so far in the wrong that the court could not let them continue as they were. Under the supervision of the court, NSEDC agreed to reorganize from the ground up and put the questions of membership and director elections to a vote of the Norton Sound residents who are the rightful owners of the CDQ program. The judge memorialized that agreement as a December 6, 1994 judgment and order.

NSEDC was ordered to hold open director elections in each of the 15 Norton Sound communities and allow residents to vote on methods for conducting future board of director elections. Ironically, NSEDC management pushed for and got the municipal election option that they now want to throw out and replace with something that can only be described as nebulous.

In 2006, Congress slipped a dirty little rider into the Coast Guard Reauthorization Act that removed the state and federal oversight that had kept CDQ group spending more or less in line and consistent with the goals and objectives of the CDQ program. That opened the door to another strong-arm takeover and most of NSEDC’s upper management was replaced. Associated with this takeover were more changes in the makeup of the board of directors inconsistent with the court’s judgment and the NSEDC bylaws.

On October 3, 2006 NSEDC held an election for one member to represent Nome on the NSEDC board using rules it later decided were, “not consistent with established corporate policy and practices with respect to voter and candidate eligibility.” Although there were four qualified candidates on the ballot, NSEDC chose to void the entire election and four months later held another one that did not follow the procedures laid out in the judgment, municipal election ordinances, Title 29 of the Alaska Statutes or its own bylaws and elected Don Stiles, who was not even on the ballot in the October 3 election.

If the people controlling NSEDC had not gotten the person they wanted the second time, they could have voided that election too and done it as many times as necessary until they elected someone they liked. This year NSEDC is proposing to use a new and confusing election method created by its bylaws committee without the involvement or informed consent of community members.

Nome’s municipal election code and Title 29 of the Alaska Statutes cover nearly every possible contingency and fully define what needs to be done to have fair and open elections. What NSEDC is proposing has none of that. If there is another questioned vote, the rules will have to be made up after the fact by NSEDC as they were in 2006.

I am disappointed in the NSEDC board and in their legal counsel. I believe what NSEDC is trying to do is unethical, violates their contractual agreement, the court’s judgment and the Magnusson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act which states that the communities have the right to select their own CDQ group directors without self-serving meddling by CDQ group management.

I was hoping for a fair and uncontested NSEDC election for a change. Apparently we won’t be getting that.

Let’s Annex ‘em

Thy say they want to use our sewage lagoons. They say they'll pay for the privilege, just like the rest of Nome's property taxpayers and renters pay for using the sewer system. Oh, wait a minute, these guys don't live in Nome. They live outside the city limits and want to drain a big tailings waste pond into the City of Nome's sewage lagoons. The Rock Creek Mine does not pay a lick of property tax to the City of Nome. It's not inside the city limits. Why is Nome Joint Utility system even considering this proposal? Why take on the liabilities? What's wrong with this picture?

At least our city council had the good sense through Councilwoman Mary Knodel to ask for an independent study on the proposal. This was clouded by Councilman Gerald Brown's insistence that the independent study not be done by any outfit that had environmental tendencies. Did Brown ever complain that the folks who did prior environmental studies for the city were also in the employ of Nova Gold? It's hard to know whom to trust. One would hope that university research would be unbiased but even our own University of Alaska is funded by big mining outfits. Should independent studies take politics into their findings?

The general public is in danger of being bamboozled by snake oil salesmen. How can we avoid flimflam? The citizens of Nome need to make it their business to pay attention to science and act accordingly. We have a lot to lose if we don't stand up for financial and environmental accountability. If we can't hold Rock Creek Mine environmentally accountable let's make them financially accountable. Let's expand our city limits to take in the property of the Rock Creek Mine and its eight-mile proposed pipeline to Nome's sewage lagoon.

Brevig Man hangs self in local hotel

At 7:55 a.m. Aug. 15 the Nome Police Department received a 911 call that Daniel E. Tocktoo, staying at the Nugget Inn had hanged himself. The Nome police and EMS personnel from the Nome Volunteer Ambulance Department responded.

Tocktoo, 20, was from Brevig Mission and had been released from the Seaside Center on Aug. 12.

Earlier in the Morning in Aug 15 he had reportedly been in an argument with his companions/roommates, locked himself in the bathroom and hanged himself with a makeshift ligature. His companions forced their way into the bathroom and attempted to perform CPR until the police and EMS arrived.

Tocktoo was transported to Norton Sound Hospital but was unable to be revived.

An autopsy was performed at the direction of the State Medical Examiner's Office. Alcohol is believed to have been involved. The next of kin were notified and investigation continues.

Army Corps reissues permit for Kensington gold mine

Last Friday the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers said it issued a permit to Idaho-based Coeur Alaska to dispose of mine tailings in Lower Slate Lake. The Kensington Gold mine is situated near Juneau and is currently under construction. The Corps' modified permit extends the time limit for construction work until July 2014.

After a long battle through the courts – local environmental groups fought against the plan to dump mine tailings into the lake – the Supreme Court decided that it would not violate the Clean Water Act. The Environmental Protection Agency had objected to Coeur Alaska's plans and had sent a letter to the Corps asking it to consider alternative solutions.

The Corps then initiated a review and last Friday said it considered more than 8,500 public comments before authorizing the modification of the permit, originally issued in 2005. Governor Sean Parnell as well as Alaska Senators Lisa Murkowski and Mark Begich came out with statements applauding the Corps' decision.

"The Corps made the right call," Governor Parnell said. "They recognized that this project has been approved through the right processes, and there's no reason for further delay." Parnell and the Senators argue that Kensington is a major gold project with estimates of 1.5 million ounces of gold and the promise to provide approximately 200 jobs. The mine has been under construction since 2005.

"This is a decision that's both good for the environment and Southeast's struggling economy," Lisa Murkowski said. "Kensington will provide hundreds of badly needed jobs and tax revenue while having a minimal affect on the environment."

The Southeast Alaska Conservation Council maintained the opposite, saying that the Supreme Court set a dangerous precedent, allowing a toxic slurry of water, chemicals and solid waste from the ore processing mill into an Alaskan lake in the Tongass National Forest. "Concerned citizens across the nation fear this ruling will open the door for the nation's lakes and streams to be used as mine tailings dumps," a SEACC statement said.

EPA seeks public input on Clean Water enforcement action plan

Trying to gauge the public's opinion on how sharp EPA's teeth should be in enforcing national water protection laws, the EPA has launched an online discussion forum to receive public comments. Until August 28, Americans are encouraged to address any concerns about EPA's efforts to protect the water in their communities. An EPA statement says that the forum is part of a larger agency effort to improve the performance and enhance public transparency of state and federal Clean Water Act enforcement programs. In a memo issued on July 2, Administrator Lisa Jackson called for stronger enforcement performance at federal and state levels and a transformation of EPA's water quality and compliance information systems.

Governor Parnell urges declaration of federal fisheries disaster for Yukon chinook

Governor Sean Parnell last week called on the U.S. Secretary of Commerce to declare a fishery disaster due to poor returns of chinook salmon on the Yukon River this summer. The Magnuson-Stevens Act authorizes federal assistance through the National Marine Fisheries Service when the Secretary of Commerce determines there is a commercial fishery failure due to a fishery resource disaster. State analysis show that the decline in the Yukon chinook fishery meets the standards in federal law as well as National Marine Fisheries Service policy for disaster declarations and criteria.

Commercial fishing is the only identified industry in the lower Yukon region that brings new money into the economy. On the entire river, more than 800 Alaska permit holders are directly affected, along with crewmen, processing employees, and those who provide support services. The Association of Village Council Presidents and the Alaska Federation of Natives also had made requests to declare a fishery disaster.

Increased ocean acidification puts crab, salmon at risk

UAF researchers found that Alaska's oceans are becoming increasingly acidic, potentially damaging Alaska's king crab and salmon fisheries. Chemical oceanographer Jeremy Mathis analyzed seawater samples collected from the depths of the Gulf of Alaska and found them more acidic than expected. Mathis concluded that ocean acidification is likely more severe and is happening more rapidly in Alaska than in tropical waters. The results also matched his recent findings in the Chukchi and Bering Seas.

Often referred to as the sister problem to climate change, ocean acidification is a term to describe increasing acidity in the world's oceans. The ocean absorbs carbon dioxide from the air. As the ocean absorbs more carbon dioxide, seawater becomes more acidic. Researchers say the ocean contains minerals that organisms like oysters and crabs use to build their shells. Ocean acidification makes it more difficult to build shells and the water can even become acidic enough to break down existing shells.

Another organism that could be affected by ocean acidification is the tiny pteropod, also known as a sea butterfly or swimming sea snail. The pteropod is at the base of the food chain and makes up nearly half of the pink salmon's diet. A 10 percent decrease in the population of pteropods could mean a 20 percent decrease in an adult salmon's body weight.

Native contracts face increased scrutiny

By Diana Haecker

Almost equally as controversial as the current debate around health care reform, the recent investigation focused on a Small Business Administration program giving preferences to Alaska Native-owned businesses spurred outrage among Alaskan Native corporations and elected Alaskan officials.

Democratic Missouri Sen. Claire McCaskill, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs subcommittee on contracting oversight, called for an investigation of the so-called 8(a) contracting preferences. McCaskill said these preferences are "driving the competitive process in the wrong direction." McCaskill held a hearing July 16 to listen to testimony from small business administrators, Alaska senators, Native leaders and two businesses claiming disadvantage due to the Alaska Native corporations' preference in the Small Business Administration's program.

The 8(a) program gives preference to minority-owned businesses, women-owned, veteran-owned or and historically disadvantaged businesses in landing federal contracts. Under a provision instituted in 1986, Alaska Native corporations, along with economically disadvantaged Indian tribes and Native Hawaiian organizations, were given a preference that eliminates a bidding process—so-called sole source contracts, where the government only negotiates with one company—and has no cap on the amount of a federal contract.

Other small businesses can participate under the 8(a) program, but their no-bid contracts are limited up to $3.5 million for services and $5.5 million for manufacturing. Alaska Native corporations are exempt from the cap. This allowed ANC's to enter into lucrative government contracts; the intent being that these contracts would create an economic upswing for impoverished Alaskan communities. The ANC's success landing these 8(a) contracts spurred McCaskill to investigate the program.

According to a review by the Small Business Administration's inspector general, federal spending on ANC 8(a) contracts rose more than 1,300 percent in the past 10 years. The report says that ANC's landed federal contracts worth $265 million in the year 2000 and that that number increased to $3.9 billion in 2008. The inspector general also found that federal agencies prefer these sole-source awards because they take less time to process and to manage than competitive awards. In short, things get done faster.

In late July, McCaskill again sent shock waves through ANC's corner offices when she introduced and then scrapped an amendment to the Defense Authorization Bill that would have limited Native corporations' ability to obtain no-bid federal defense contracts under the Small Business Administration's 8(a) Business Development Program. The Department of Defense uses $5 billion worth of services from ANC's, followed by the Department of the Interior with $1 billion and the Department of Homeland Security with $980 million.

Alaska Sen. Mark Begich's spokeswoman Julie Hasquet told The Nome Nugget that at Begich's request McCaskill dropped the amendment and signaled to work with the Alaska delegation, Native corporations and the Small Business Administration on an overhaul of the SBA 8(a) program.

McCaskill said in her opening remarks of the July 16 hearing that critics have identified these preferences as a vehicle for avoiding competition and passing work to large, non-Native contractors. McCaskill quoted from a preliminary report gathered by her staff, which itself came under fire as AFN president Julie Kitka and Sen. Lisa Murkowski spent most of their testimony putting the report's numbers in the historic context of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act of 1971 as well as reminding the committee about the special government-to-government relationship the United States has with Native tribes.

A bone of contention was the part of the subcommittee's investigation that revealed that most contracts with Alaska Native corporations are performed outside Alaska. McCaskill's staff analysis says that between 2000 and 2008, only $5 billion, or 21 percent, of all contract dollars awarded to ANC's were performed in the state of Alaska. The rest was spent in Virginia, Maryland, Florida and California.

McCaskill alleged that Alaska Native corporations may also be passing work through to their subcontractors and that they employ relatively few of their shareholders, relying heavily on non-Native managers.

McCaskill also criticized that ANC's receive a disproportionate share of 8(a) contracts as ANC's rake in 18 percent of all federal contract dollars under the program. "Nobody begrudges giving small, disadvantaged businesses a chance to win federal contracts," said McCaskill in her opening statement. "But the Alaska Native corporations have used their special preferences to bust the door down."

Sarah Lukin with the Native American Contractor's Association countered, saying that only 0.8 percent of 8(a) contracts are awarded to Native corporations. "The problems in government contracting are systemic and should not be visited on the Native 8(a) or the other small and disadvantaged business programs. Native 8(a)s do not take business from other 8(a)s, but we offer real competition to the large contractors and real value to the taxpayer," Lukin, an Alutiiq of Port Lions, said.

McCaskill had in May requested financial information from 20 regional and village corporations, including Bering Straits Native Corp. and NANA. A University of Alaska Institute of Social and Economic Research report prepared at the request of Sen. Begich supports the social and economic importance of 8(a) subsidiaries,

"Nobody begrudges giving small, disadvantaged businesses a chance to win federal contracts. But the Alaska Native corporations have used their special preferences to bust the door down."

— Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo.

especially to rural ANC's. The report says that there are 176 ANC 8(a) contractors in Alaska and that McCaskill's request for information was addressed to 20 ANC's and focused on those that are large and high-profile. "The vast majority of ANC 8(a)s however—more than 80 percent—are village corporations working relatively small contracts, hiring local people and sharing the economic benefits with local shareholders in small, remote villages. They are teaching the next generation about American entrepreneurial values and opportunities," reads the report.

McCaskill said that although the numbers of 8(a) contracts are impressive, only a fraction of the profits seep to the shareholder base. "If we take a hard look at the numbers, only about $615 a year in money, scholarships and other benefits goes back to each member of the Alaska Native community," she said. She added that over the past three weeks, she has witnessed a very vocal and well-financed lobby outspoken in support of the 8(a) program preferences. "But our responsibility is to look out for the taxpayers—not the Alaska Native corporations and their profit margins, other federal contractors, or any other influential special interests," she said.

Gail Schubert, vice president with the Bering Strait Native Corp., told The Nome Nugget that the 8(a) program is very important to BSNC and that its profits indeed do trickle down to the shareholder. "A significant portion that comes out of the 8(a) government contracting was used to increase our contributions to the Bering Straits Foundation. We've been able to increase our dividends and to hire and train shareholders," she said.

The three-hour long hearing included testimony from federal SBA auditors and administrators, Department of Defense officials, AFN president Kitka, director of the Native American Contractor's Association, director of the National Congress of American Indians and two business people testifying against the Native Alaskan 8(a) preference.

One Small Business Administration official said that "ANC participation in the 8(a) program has undeniably benefited Alaska Natives and tribes and that this may be limiting the ability of non-ANC-owned companies to secure 8(a) contracts." But Debra Ritt with the SBA also identified problems saying that a very small number of ANC participants received a disproportionate share of the 8(a) pie. "The procurement advantages that ANC-owned companies enjoy, and their ability to get access to capital and credit through their parent companies, may be working to disadvantage other 8(a) participants," she said.

Joseph Jordan, also with the Small Business Administration said that in recent years, SBA's inspector general, the Government Accountability Office and Congress have identified a number of management challenges with the ANC program, in particular. "While we may differ over our analysis of a few of the details, we all agree on the overarching need for greater oversight to ensure the program operates in accordance with its

One dead, one charged in Stebbins fight

17-year-old Zachary Pete arrived to find older brother pummeled, allegedly retaliated with log

By Tyler Rhodes

A 26-year-old man from Kotlik is dead and a teenager from Stebbins is facing manslaughter charges following a fight in Stebbins Aug. 15.

Zachary Alexander Pete, 17, is being held in the Anvil Mountain Correctional Center on $25,000 bail after allegedly striking Richard Yunak in the head with a large piece of wood and kicking him during a fight last Saturday. Yunak was pronounced dead of his injuries that evening in Stebbins.

According to the criminal complaint filed against Pete, Yunak and Pete's older brother, Louis Pete, 26, were involved in a fight when the younger Pete arrived. The complaint states that another party, Carolyn Kirk, saw the fight and witnessed Yunak punch and knock Louis Pete to the ground.

The younger Pete said he came running when he heard his brother's voice involved in an altercation, according to the complaint. After seeing his brother on the ground with his face beaten up and bleeding, Zachary Pete said he thought his brother may be dead and was trying to protect him, the complaint states. Zachary Pete allegedly said he was knocked down by Yunak before running to the beach and grabbing a piece of wood.

When Pete arrived back at the scene of the fight, Ignatius Matthias Jr. was holding Yunak, according to the complaint. Pete allegedly struck Yunak twice near the face with the wood, knocking him to the ground. The complaint states Pete then kicked Yunak a couple of times while he was on the ground.

The on-call health aide in Stebbins at the time, Stacie Matthias, responded to the scene to find both the elder Pete and Yunak on the ground. According to the complaint, the health aide found Yunak to have a weak pulse and low respirations before he stopped breathing all together. She performed CPR at the scene and continued so at the village clinic before Yunak was pronounced dead. The complaint said an exam of Yunak showed he suffered a severe injury to the right side of his neck with significant swelling and discoloration.

According to Alaska State Troopers, Louis

Pete was flown to Anchorage for treatment of severe head injuries. Troopers reported that he was in stable condition.

Zachary Pete was arraigned in Nome before Magistrate Bradley Gater on Aug. 16. He was appointed a public defender at that time. Aside from a few curfew violations in Stebbins, a state records check showed no criminal history for Pete.

State statutes defines manslaughter as someone who "intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly caused the death of another person under circumstances not amounting to murder in the first or second degree."

A preliminary hearing in the matter is set for Aug. 26 at 1:30 p.m.

intended purpose of promoting opportunities for ANC firms free of waste, fraud and abuse," Jordan said.

However, Alaska Sens. Murkowski and Begich defended the validity of the program for Alaskan Natives. Murkowski said in her testimony that she believes that the Indian 8(a) preferences are achieving important economic development objectives and are well worth preserving as a matter of federal Indian policy. "This senator does not believe that these contracting preferences undermine the integrity of all federal contracting," she said. "While the dollar value of some individual contracts may be substantial, taken together all of the contracting under this preference accounts something on the order of 1 percent of the total federal contract pie. And I am deeply concerned by the suggestion that a victory for the Indians is a defeat for businesses enjoying preferences through other socioeconomic classifications."

Murkowski went on to say that Alaska Native corporations have fully committed their tribes and business enterprises to meet the 8(a) opportunities. "Our Native leaders have entered into contracts, hired people, created systems and focused all of their energies on learning this business. Now that same federal government threatens to pull the rug out from under them," she said. "I fear that we are moving down the road to breaking yet another promise to the Indians. If we are not careful policy changes prompted by this subcommittee's inquiry will go down in history as another of the ill-conceived policies that we in the Congress are later forced to apologize for."

Begich commented in a prepared statement saying that while he supports the ANC preference, he recognizes the 8(a) program is not perfect and he agrees with recommendations that the SBA needs to clarify its procedures and fully staff its oversight mission. "I look forward to working with this subcommittee and the Congress to ensure that this program continues to work properly and effectively for Alaska Native corporations and all Americans," Begich said.

Rep. Don Young was not invited to testify, but submitted a written testimony expressing his dismay. "I am surprised and disappointed that this Senate committee denied me the professional courtesy usually extended to fellow members of Congress," Young said.

Young asserted that the program's success has given Alaska Natives a degree of economic and social self-determination, something that has long been the goal of federal Indian policy. "Much of what is being reported on Alaska Native corporations is incorrect and misrepresented and is based on lack of research and lack of proper information; that's incredibly unfortunate," he said in his statement. "I consistently fail to see why our Congress is seeking to punish a successful program that is working exactly as intended. Congress' decision to allow Alaska Native participation was the correct one, and we are beginning to see the payoff now."

Other businesses object

However, the other side of the coin was presented via two business people testifying how hard it is to compete with ANCs. Mark Lumer representing Cirrus Technology Inc., a small business located in Huntsville, Ala., said he was formerly a contracting official with the Department of the Army. "The first observation I want to make is that as a contracting officer for 25 years, the unlimited sole source authority for ANCs was a very useful tool to get contracts awarded quickly under the Competition in Contracting Act," Lumer said.

He is not in favor of having that tool completely eliminated, but as a small business representative, he said that it is incredibly difficult to compete with ANCs under the current rules. He said his business would not even compete for any procurement if there were a history of ANC involvement or where there is the likelihood that an ANC will go after the job directly.

Another business woman from New York said that her business lost a follow-up contract to a job they've been locally working on at the Army station Fort Drum to two Alaskan Native corporations, Chugach and Alutiiq, on a sole-source, no-bid basis. "We were given various reasons why this decision had been made, ranging from there not being enough time to procure this contract using traditional contracting methods to the unbelievable argument that this sole-source contract would lead to the most potential for involvement by local companies," she said.

Taking a more philosophical stance on the importance of the special relationship and treaties between Indian and Alaska tribes with the federal government, AFN president Kitka said in her testimony that it would not be fair or just to separate the economic treatment of Alaska Natives from the settlement of aboriginal claims. She asserted that the root in the discussion is the integrity of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act—which cleared the way for the building of the trans-Alaska oil pipeline as Alaska Natives extinguished all claims to the land in exchange for 44 million acres of land and millions in cash. "ANCSA is the foundation of much of the Alaska Natives economic and legal relationship with the federal government, but it is much more than that. It embodies most of our economic and relational agreements with the federal government, agreements for which our people relinquished valid legal claims to lands and resources in Alaska, our homeland," Kitka said.

She went on to say that Alaskan Natives then had to take a tough stand as they were all about keeping land, culture and Native lifestyle intact as the primary objective of ANCSA. The creations of Native corporations and the mandate to be profitable weren't on their minds, back then. However, she said, the Native corporations have come a long way, evolving and fulfilling their mandates. She said that the greatest benefit of ANCs' participation in the 8(a) program is the capacity building. "We are both contributing to the U.S. economic recovery and building our capacity to help more. We are involved in nation-building work, which benefits all Americans," Kitka said.

In response to the July 16 hearing, Sen. Murkowski asked for a hearing on the matter in front of the Indian Affairs Committee. Murkowski called the July hearing a "hostile environment" for ANCs. Also, several ANCs including NANA, Chenega Corp., Alutiiq, Chugach Alaska and Koniag joined Lower 48 Native American tribes and contractors associations in a coalition called "Native 8(a) works." Their stated purpose is to fight "misrepresentations of their government contracting work." The group asserts that Native 8 (a) businesses have helped create more 31,000 good-paying jobs, help to fund college educations and provide economic support and opportunities to Native people.

from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday, and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday. Subsistence hook-and-line fishing is open seven days a week. Subsistence catch limits are listed on the back of the permit for each area.

"The silver passage at the Nome and Snake [river] weirs has been very poor," Menard continued. "Aerial surveys have shown silvers moving into the lower reaches of other rivers, but few silvers have moved into the Nome and Snake rivers. Water levels have been very low, and rainy weather bringing increasing water levels would likely help to improve escapement counts at the weirs. The department will determine late [this] week if fishing restrictions are necessary until silver escapements improve in the subdistrict."

Red king crab harvest

Commercial fishermen harvested 185,515 pounds of red king crab through Aug. 14, with 157,360 pounds of quota remaining in the Norton Sound open access fishery, Menard reports. "The catch is well below recent years for this date, and the trend line indicates the quota will not be caught until September," he noted. "There are 20 vessels still crabbing and 22 vessels have made deliveries this year."

Menard prepared the following report on commercial catches and escapement numbers for salmon species for each of the six subdistricts in the Norton Sound district and for the Port Clarence and Kotzebue districts.

Unalakleet subdistrict

Preliminary commercial catches to date are 18,094 chums, 11,761 pinks, 41 sockeyes and 37,650 silvers. As in recent years, silver catches are tracking well above average.

The Unalakleet River Test Fish catches through Aug. 14 were 135 kings, 1,476 chums, 1,034 pinks, 19 sockeyes and 835 silvers. The silver catch is 20 percent above the recent five-year average and 45 percent above the recent 10-year average. In the recent record silvers runs, the midpoint for the five-year average from 2004-2008 was Aug. 14, but the 10-year average is Aug. 18 at the test net. This is an ADF&G project with assistance from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp.

The North River Tower escapement goals are: Kings, 1,200-2,600; chums, no goal established; pinks, 25,000; silvers, 550-1,100 (aerial survey goal). Cumulative counts through Aug. 14 are 2,346 kings, 8,898 chums, 189,198 pinks and 6,672 silvers. Silvers are tracking 20 percent below the recent five-year average, but 10 percent above the 10-year average. The average historical midpoint at the tower is Aug. 12. This is a cooperative project of ADF&G and NSEDC.

Shaktoolik subdistrict

Preliminary commercial catches to date are 10,537 chums, 5,234 pinks, 27 sockeyes, and 7,051 silvers. Silver catches have been above average.

Norton Bay subdistrict

Preliminary commercial catches to date are 1,860 chums, 555 pinks and 1,720 silvers. No comparisons can be made with previous years because this year is only the second year in the last 10 years that commercial salmon fishing has occurred.

Moses Point (Elim) subdistrict

Preliminary commercial catches to date are 260 chums, 11 pinks and 3,963 silvers. The cumulative silver catch is well above average.

The Kwiniuk River Tower escapement goals are: Kings, 300-550; chums, 11,500-23,000; pinks, 8,400; and silvers, 650-1,300 (aerial survey goal). Cumulative counts through Aug. 14 are 444 kings, 8,709 chums, 42,861 pinks and 2,757 silvers.

Silver counts at the tower rank sixth in the nine years of counting by this date. The average historical first quarter point is Aug. 10 and the average historical midpoint is Aug. 20. This is an

ADF&G project with assistance from NSEDC.

Golovin subdistrict

Preliminary commercial catches to date are 42 chums and 1,568 silvers. The cumulative silver catch is well above average.

The Niukluk River Tower escapement goals are: Pinks, 10,500; chums, minimum of 30,000; kings, minimum of 100 (combined Fish River and Boston Creek aerial survey); and silvers, 2,400-6,100. Cumulative counts through Aug. 14 are 210 kings, 15,759 chums, 24,042 pinks and 1,797 silvers.

The silver count is tracking average with the recent five-year average and is 25 percent above the 10-year average. The average historical first quarter point is Aug. 13 and the average historical midpoint is Aug. 21. This is an ADF&G project with assistance from NSEDC.

Nome subdistrict

The Eldorado River Weir escapement goal for chums is 6,000-9,200. The last day of counting was Aug. 3. Cumulative counts are 31 kings, 4,943 chums, 1,119 pinks and two silvers. This is a cooperative project between NSEDC and ADF&G.

The Nome River Weir escapement goals are: Chums, 2,900-4,300; and pinks, 3,150 (odd-numbered year). Cumulative counts through Aug. 14 are eight kings, 1,296 chums, 16,129 pinks, 61 sockeyes and 39 silvers.

To date the silver counts have been very low, with this year's count ranking 14th out of 17 years of counts. The average historical first quarter point is Aug. 18 and the average historical midpoint is Aug. 28. This is an ADF&G project with assistance from NSEDC.

The Snake River Weir escapement goal is 1,600-2,500 chums. Cumulative counts through Aug. 13 are four kings, 837 chums, 739 pinks and seven silvers. The silver count for this date is the second worst in 15 years of counting at the project. The average historical first quarter point is Aug. 21 and the average midpoint is Aug. 27. This is a cooperative project between NSEDC and ADF&G.

Port Clarence district

All salmon net fishing remains closed on the Pilgrim and Kuzitrin Rivers. Hook-and-line is the only legal subsistence gear to harvest salmon in the Pilgrim and Kuzitrin Rivers. Sport fish bag limits are in effect for subsistence hook-and-line fishing.

The Pilgrim River Weir escapement goal (aerial survey at Salmon Lake and Grand Central tributary to Salmon Lake) is 4,000-8,000 sockeye. Cumulative counts through Aug. 13 are 42 kings, 4,121 chums, 464 pinks, 933 sockeyes and 11 silvers.

All counts are the lowest since the weir began operations in 2003.

All salmon passage, except for chum and silvers, is probably at the 99 percent point. The average historical third quarter point for chum salmon is Aug. 12. The average historical first quarter point for silvers is Aug. 18. Historically, silver passage at the weir has only been in the hundreds each year, as the Pilgrim River does not get a large silver run. The weir is a cooperative NSEDC/ADF&G project.

Kotzebue district

Commercial fishing is open from 6 a.m. to 2 p.m. from Monday to Saturday. The buyer can shorten the period for their fleet if necessary. Catches and the catch per unit of effort were above average last week. The buyer shortened fishing periods to four hours a day last week. The preliminary harvest total through Aug. 15 was 141,168 chums for 52 permit holders. The catch is on track for a forecasted harvest range of 150,000 to 200,000 chums in 2009.

The Kobuk River Test Fish is an ADF&G project. The catch through Aug. 14 was 814 chums and 430 sheefish. The cumulative chum index is 797 points and has fallen behind most years, but is above the 600 index points necessary for commercial fishing to continue. Historically, the midpoint of the chum catches is the first week of August. The cumulative sheefish index is 455 points, or average.

trict to provide information for its teachers, staff and communities as a whole.

Superintendent Jon Wehde said the district plans to send information home to parents on the first day of school Aug. 25, detailing the district's policies and plans for handling the flu. Wehde said extra attention will be paid to good hygiene practices this fall, including the importance of hand washing and the correct way to cover coughs and sneezes. He said the schools will have plenty of anti-bacterial soap available and will likely increase the frequency of "shock cleanings" conducted on the facilities. "We may have to do shock cleaning on a daily basis versus bi-weekly, which is the case now," Wehde said.

Wehde also said the district is looking at how to manage if a large number of staff were sidelined all at once with the flu. Closing the schools so far does not appear to be a card that is on the table. Several schools on the east coast shut down last spring in response to a number of their students contacting the flu. Kilby said school closures don't appear to be particularly effective in stemming the spread of the flu. Often in lieu of gathering together at school, the students will continue to congregate elsewhere, which still provides the flu the chance to spread.

Wehde did say, however, that in addition to the emphasis on good hygiene, school officials will be keeping a more watchful eye out for students who appear sick. "It's not uncommon for a school secretary to make a call if a student appears sick. Half the time the kids stays and half the time the kid goes home," he said. "We may have to up our rigor to ask a student to go home or that they stay at home. It's a whole new level of awareness and concern."

Teachers are not the only ones who should be reminding students of good hygiene or deciding if a child is too sick to come to school. "Parents should be reviewing with their children ways to stop the spread of germs," Kilby said. "The other thing we want to stress to parents is to make sure they're not sending sick children to school."

Kilby said the hospital is planning to send out information region-wide in the coming weeks to inform the public as the flu season hits. She said Norton Sound Health Corp. is also developing a telephone line to be staffed 24 hours a day to answer questions and provide advice regarding the flu. She said the "flu line" could help callers determine if they should seek further medical attention. Kilby said the number will be available to the region's villages as well as in Nome.

Kilby said a flu shot for the H1N1 is currently undergoing clinical trials at the federal level and may be available in Nome by late October. She expects the shot for the seasonal flu to be available in the region earlier, in September rather than October. Kilby said if more people get the seasonal flu shot it will better help identify the number of H1N1 cases in the area.

When the H1N1 flu shot does become available in the region, Kilby said it will initially be distributed to high-risk groups. Those in that group include pregnant women, children 5-years-old and younger, and those with immune system deficiencies or other chronic health problems. She also noted that health care providers will get the shot, "because if your health care providers get sick, they can't take care of the rest of us," she said. Kilby said after those initial groups are covered, remaining flu shots for H1N1 may be distributed to other groups.

Shots for both types of flu should be available by the annual health fair slated for Oct. 23-24 this year.

Anti-viral medication is also available for those who have already contacted the H1N1 flu. Like the vaccine, the anti-viral medication will be restricted in its availability to high-risk groups since there is not enough in the region to cover the entire population. Kilby noted that the medication does not cure the flu, but only reduces its severity. "It's not a cure-all," she said.

Anti-viral medications will be available in villages as well as in Nome when needed, she said.

Like the schools, Kilby said the hospital is also looking at contingency plans if the number of flu cases coming through the doors overwhelms the system. One such measure could be converting part of the facility, such as the public health office, into a flu clinic.

Kilby said the hospital is recommending that people take care of routine medical needs now in the case that flu cases do swamp the system. Those who wait could face long wait times or delays in scheduling appointments.

What kind of toll, if any, the H1N1 flu will take on area communities is still just conjecture at this point. The most productive actions people can take, Kilby said, is to simply adopt and abide by practices. Those include frequent hand washing with soap or sanitizer, and covering coughs and sneezes. Kilby also recommended keeping personal contact to a minimum, a practice known as "social distancing."

"So wave at your neighbor instead of shaking hands," she said.

Unalakleet's mushing mayor to make Iditarod debut

Middy Johnson wins Seppala Heritage Grant

By Tyler Rhodes

When Unalakleet's William "Middy" Johnson leads his dogs to the starting line in Willow next March, he will do so as a rookie Iditarod musher.

While it will be the first time Johnson, 43, runs the course that finishes under Nome's burl arch, it will be far from the first brush he has had with the storied race. The Unalakleet mayor's ties to the Iditarod run deep in his blood.

In addition to having two brothers who have run the race, Johnson's grandfather, Henry Ivanoff, participated in the 1925 serum run to deliver antitoxin to Nome to stave off a potential diphtheria epidemic. The Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race, in part, commemorates that life-saving relay.

It's more than fitting, then, that Johnson is the recipient of this year's Seppala Heritage Grant. The $10,000 award is given to rookie mushers who show a commitment to working with dogs and display strong character traits. The namesake of the grant, Leonhard Seppala, was the most famous musher of his time—and the man to whom Ivanoff handed the serum during the frigid 1925 relay. "He exemplifies what the grant is intended for—a rural musher with the desire to run the Iditarod," said Laura Samuelson, a Nome resident who is also a member of the grant's selection committee.

For years Johnson has helped with the Iditarod, whether it's been breaking trail, organizing checkpoints or making sure the arriving mushers have somewhere to stay once they hit Unalakleet. He has dog handled for his brother, Paul, during his Iditarod run. Now, after running the Kobuk 440 and the Two Rivers 200 last winter as qualifier races, Johnson is ready to finally see the Iditarod from the runners.

Receiving the Seppala Heritage Grant will go a long way toward bringing another rural Alaska musher into the race. "I've been very fortunate to get the grant. I'm sure there were a lot of good grant applications out there," Johnson said. "It is such a huge expense. It goes two times as far for me perhaps as for somebody on the road system. I'm really appreciative of it."

The initial $40,000 commitment for the grants was made by Maya Ramsey, Seppala's granddaughter. The first four recipients of the grant were Jon Korda, Warren Palfrey, Nome's Melissa Owens and Wade Marrs. The funds for Johnson's grant came from 2008 All Alaska Sweepstakes winner Mitch Seavey donating $10,000 of his $100,000 prize. Samuelson said as of now, there are no funds lined up for new grants to be awarded.

Once the backbone of winter transportation in Alaska, the use of sled dogs has all but disappeared in many rural villages, as the snowmachine has become the primary mode of transport on snow and ice. Likewise, the number of rural mushers racing the Iditarod has dwindled as the number of kennels in the bush shrinks and the cost to run the race balloons.

While $10,000 is a sizeable award, Johnson said it won't cover even half his cost to run the race. Johnson figures he will spend upward of $35,000 on the effort. Kibble for the dogs, alone, cost $80 a bag landed in Unalakleet, he said. "The expense of everything here is so high," he said.

Nevertheless, Johnson hopes his running the race will help inspire others to keep the traditions alive. "I think it will be good for the region. It's been great to see Melissa [Owens] go, and Joe Garnie and others," Johnson said. "Hopefully this will keep the spirit of mushing going in the villages."

Outside of the costs, and perhaps reduced access to veterinary care, Johnson does not see living in rural Alaska as an obstacle to being competitive in the Iditarod or other big races. On the contrary, he thinks the Norton Sound coast provides him with ideal practice grounds. "I've got some of the best training conditions out here. I've got hills. I've got flats. I've got wind. And I've got the coast," he said.

As for how that training will play out in the 2010 Iditarod, Johnson said he would be pleased with a finish in the top half of the pack. "I'd like to do as well as I can for what I've put into the dogs, as far as training goes," he said. "The top half would be a significant thing for me."

Johnson said his desire to run the Iditarod comes from many corners. He simply loves to run dogs. He watches the race come through his town each year. His brothers have run the Iditarod. He also wants to send a message. "I want to go out and maybe show that, hey, we can be competitive, that we [as rural Alaskans] can do these things too," he said. "Maybe it will be an inspiration for somebody else that you don't have to be from a big city or have a big sponsor, and that you can accomplish a feat like running the Iditarod."

That feat for Johnson is by no means a done deal. The Unalakleet mayor knows he has his work cut out for him. "I've got a lot of work left to do," he said. "That's the biggest part of it, between the first part of September when I start training and the start. The hardest part will be mid-season."

As for the actual race, Johnson said he's had to answer the question of whether his dogs will want to stop once they reach Unalakleet, despite still having a few hundred miles of trail to run. "If they're mentally tough, I shouldn't have a problem," he said. "I can sneak out of here in the dark. I've got a couple things I've got planned to try and take care of the issue. Maybe it's a different stop on the trail to camp out. Maybe a mix of running check point to check point like Lance Mackey, he's no stranger to blowing through check points."

For Johnson, himself, he figures he can keep on pushing through after he makes a stop at home. "It will be nice to visit [Unalakleet], though. I see these people 345 days of the year," he said.

NEC wraps up Wellness Festival with song, dance and dinner

After two full days of conferences, meetings and presentations, participants in Nome Eskimo Community's Wellness Festival were able to let their hair down and have some fun at the Nome Recreation Center during a large potluck and potluck Aug. 12.

The evening was punctuated with performances by local artists and guests. Visitors from Ma'o Tosi's Alaska Pride Club wowed the audience with breakdancing, poetry, musical performances, raps and face-painting. Tosi and his club were brought up to the festival by NEC to provide workshops on engaging youth to participate in programs and keep on track to stay in school and move on to higher education.

Also in town for the event was the Matt Lewis band, whose upbeat tunes got the crowd dancing in the Rec Center. The band also gave workshops for adults and youth, and performed at a local restaurant last Tuesday.

Local acts also grabbed the stage at the potluck celebration. The King Island Dancers, Sarah Hanson with three of her guitar students, and Arlo Hannigan were all slated to perform for the crowd.

The evening also featured a huge spread of food. Fish, stews, burgers and salads were just a few of the offerings gobbled up by the crowd.

Underdogs win in do-or-die softball finals

Friday proved to be the night of the underdog during the season championships at Nome's softball fields.

Facing the uphill battle of needing to win two games in a row to take the title, the Breakers Bar "Ball Breakers" on the women's side and the Board of Trade "Hustlers" for the men outplayed the top-seeded teams to take home the titles.

On the men's side, BOT beat out the perennial favorites, the Polaris Bar, in a couple of heavy-hitting games. In game one, the Hustlers stayed alive with a 13-9 win. In the second match, a grueling slug-fest, BOT racked up 31 runs to Polaris' 29.

On the women's side of the fields, the Ball Breakers steamrolled their way to a 16-4 win over Q-Trucking's "Mother Truckers" in the first do-or-die game. Breakers kept that prowess at the plate alive in the second game, winning the title after a 21-10 victory.

EAT AND CHAT—Nomeites and non-Nomeites alike enjoy the hot dogs and sun at Crowley’s celebration of their new tug, Sesok named for the inupiaq word for beluga whale.

Sesok arrives with fanfare and food

By Tyler Rhodes

If the fuel delivery business doesn’t pan out for Craig Tornga, he might consider running a hot dog cart.

Tornga, Crowley Maritime Corp.’s vice president of marine services, manned a barbecue full of foot-longs as an ever-growing line of Nomeites queued up for lunch Monday at the Port of Nome’s lower dock.

The food was good and the price was right, drawing a good crowd to the port under sunny skies. But lunch wasn’t the main attraction. Tied to the dock and standing tall over the scene was reason for the party—Crowley’s new tug, the Sesok.

The fuel delivery company is celebrating the tug’s maiden voyage through western Alaska with community barbecues along its route. The Sesok, which means “beluga whale” in Inupiaq, is Crowley’s newest shallow-draft river tug designed to deliver freight and fuel to rural villages.

The new $5 million craft, along with its sister ship, the Nachik, are designed specifically for Alaska’s remote locations where infrastructure is often sparse or nonexistent, said Crowley’s Dorine Tessier. “We’re pretty proud of them. There’s not a whole lot of people investing in Alaska right now,” she said.

The ships are designed to handle both coastal and river conditions. The ships have a draft of only 3 1/2 feet, yet they pack a punch with 1,362 horsepower. “The value of this boat is really in its draft,” Tornga said.

With rivers being the lifeblood for supplying western Alaska villages, low water can mean fuel and supplies not arriving before winter. If those items cannot be barged in, the alternative is an expensive delivery by airplane. “If the water’s even barely there, we’ll try and get in there,” Tessier said.

Unlike its predecessors, Tornga said the new river tugs are equipped with winches. The new tugs also utilize electric equipment where before much of the machinery onboard was run by hydraulics. Tornga said in examining many of the fuel spills experienced by its fleet, hydraulic fluid was often the culprit. Eliminating that potential source of pollution helps make the vessels more environmentally sound, he said.

The Sesok wasn’t in Nome just for show. It had already made a stop in Emmonak last Friday and, after Nome, the tug was bound for Hooper Bay next to deliver a load of fuel. Along with the fuel, Crowley plans to deliver another barbecue celebration to Hooper Bay. A similar party is scheduled for Bethel in September.

Inuit-Neeser win hospital contract

Joint venture to build $90.4 million project

By Tyler Rhodes

Teamed up with one of Alaska's biggest developers, a Bering Straits Native Corp. subsidiary has landed a $90.4 million contract to build in its backyard.

The joint venture of Inuit Services Inc. and Neeser Construction Inc. was awarded the contract Aug. 19 to construct the new Norton Sound Regional Hospital in Nome.

Funded through the Indian Health Service as part of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act, the project will result in a new hospital on the north side of Nome off the Bypass Road. The site has been marked by a gravel pad for more than a year with approximately 180 pilings pounded in place early last winter.

The partnership between NCI and Inuit brings together two firms that are no strangers to rural Alaska and the Norton Sound region. For Inuit, Nome is the company's home turf. "We're excited that we have a local contractor that has a lot of experience in Alaska and that is aware of our weather conditions here," said Norton Sound Health Corp. President and Chief Executive Officer Carol Piscocya.

Despite being based in Anchorage, NCI is also well familiar with the region. "Neeser has not done any projects in

Nome's new police chief to take the helm Oct. 1

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Common Council approved a contract with John J. Papasodora as the city's Chief of Police at a meeting Monday.

The city will pay Papasodora $93,000 for the first 12 months of his three-year contract beginning Oct. 1. He currently serves as commander of the Alaska State Troopers Bureau of Investigation.

Papasodora began his career in Alaska as a patrol officer for the City of Soldotna in 1985. Last weekend he joined Interim Chief of Police Dallas Massey in a foot patrol in Nome, according to City Manager Josie Bahnke. She said he also worked a shift with a Nome police officer Friday night.

The council also approved first reading of an ordinance authorizing disposal of municipal property in a portion of Anvil City Square by use permit to Sitnasuak Native Corp. for placement of the Two Eskimo Boys statue.

Councilman Jon Larson made a motion to remove the following three vehicles from a resolution awarding bids from the City of Nome vehicle sale: A 1999 Ford Expedition, a 1995 Ford Explorer and a 1990 Ford E 150 van. Stanley Okpealuk Sr. bid $19.50 for all three vehicles.

Larson said the city would be selling the vehicles for nothing, and they would be moved to

Crab season, salmon runs stress fishermen

Fishermen spar with Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation over operation of fish plant

By Laurie McNicholas

Nome fisherman Robin Thomas distributed a written complaint about management of the Norton Sound Seafood Products plant in Nome at the outset of a five-hour special meeting of the NSSP Working Group Aug. 18 at the plant.

Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. owns and operates the NSSP plant in Nome, which processes red king crab and halibut. Rich Ferry recently was named manager of the plant.

NSEDC also operates the NSSP plant in Unalakleet, which processes salmon and herring under the management of William (Middy) Johnson, who participated in the meeting by teleconference.

As one of six entities in the Western Alaska Community Development Program, NSEDC represents 15 member communities in the Bering Strait region. The CDQ program began in 1992 with the goal of promoting fisheries related economic development in western Alaska. The program receives a 10 percent allocation of the annual total allowable catch of pollock in the Bering Sea, along with catch allocations of other fish and crab species in the Bering Sea/Aleutian Islands area.

In his complaint, Thomas also raised questions about NSEDC's financial policy for NSSP. He wants to know whether the NSEDC board of directors considers it more important to mitigate NSSP's operating losses than to support the fishermen who deliver their catches to the plants in Nome and Unalakleet.

This is a long-standing issue of wide interest, but the board has not discussed it publicly or developed an explicit financial plan for NSSP. The 17 agenda items discussed during the meeting are too numerous to cover in this edition. They included most of the points in Thomas's complaint, which is the focus of this report.

Tim Smith, president of the Nome

Fishermen's Association, said he has heard that NSEDC budgets an annual loss of $2.1 million for the Nome plant. NSEDC's Board Chairman Dan Harrelson acknowledged the plant loses more than $1 million a year, not including tender costs. "You don't know how much the ten-

Nome Joint Utility System's books are in the black, thanks to sufficient rates to customers to cover hard cash operating expenses, monthly payments and capital project budgets, according to auditors.

Results of an audit of calendar years 2007 and 2008 ending last December showed that Nome's utility financial statements were in order and reflected fairly the financial position of Nome Joint Utility System, according to John Bost of accounting firm Mikunda, Cottrell and Co.

Overall, utility assets overshadowed liabilities by $83.5 million. The audit document shows assets, including capital assets, at $106.4 million and total liabilities at $22.6 million. Unrestricted assets of $6.6 million stand available to meet customer and debtor obligations. A change in law covering the booking of depreciation expenses left the util-

Editorial

We Won't Go Away

No matter how many times the US Postal Service closes its eyes, spins around and makes a wish— Nome is still here. AND we want our mail. Sure, we know it is expensive to deliver mail to Nome. We live here, we know all about the high cost of living. However, there are certain basic services one expects from the federal government and the delivery of the US Mail is vital. Nome should not have to be constantly on the snipping end of the USPS's budget scissors.
Nome has not had a regular postmaster for over two years. We have not replaced employees who have moved or retired. We don't have door-to-door delivery service and the feds have put the Post Office building up for sale. Sometimes the cost cutting measures just don't make sense, but we can be assured that these decisions are conceived in the Anchorage or Seattle think tanks. Many Nomeites may remember when Post Office lobby remodeling a few years ago eliminated the file-drawer-sized boxes used by organizations that received high volume of mail. These folks were told they had to use a pouch, which could be picked up by going to the service window and asking for it. There are about 15 businesses, including the Nugget that are pouch users. (A pouch is one of those big white boxes to the right, behind the counter.) In a revenue generating measure the Postal Service tells these Nome businesses that they will be charged close to $1,000 a year to use a pouch. However, they may pay $78 and have a regular letter-sized box like everyone else and the overflow mail will be put in a big white box that can be picked up by going to the counter and asking for it. Now the Postal Service has to fill a letter box and a pouch box and they won't make any more money because who would pay $1,000 when they can get their mail for $78 and let the stack of unsolicited catalogs pile up in the white box?
The US Mail has meaning and touches all our lives. It is a service that we all use and yes, it will cost money. It is not and never should be a profit driven business. It is a government service. We appreciate our Post Office and the folks who work there. As residents of this nation we Nomeites and all the folks in western Alaska and the rest of the USA have the right to expect prompt and efficient postal service. —N.L.M.—

Utility Board and the Nome Board of Education. The election will also include the seat on Norton Sound Economic Development Corp.'s board of directors designated for Nome.
As of Aug. 24, most incumbents had filed to run again for their seats. No challengers had yet signed up.
Incumbent Mayor Denise Michels has signaled her intent to retain her seat. The term for the mayor of Nome is two years.
The common council has two seats opening up, Seat C held by Randy Pomeranz and Seat D held by Stan Andersen. Both seats cover three-year terms. As of Aug. 24, neither the incumbents nor any challenger had filed to run for the seats.
The utility board has openings for two of its seats. Seat A, with a two-year term, is currently held by Jim West Jr. Seat C, with a three-year term, is currently held by Dave Barron. Both have signaled their intent to run again.
Seats C and D—both carrying three-year terms—are up for grabs on the school board. Those seats are currently held by Lynette Schmidt and Betsy Brennan, respectively. Schmidt obtained her seat in late July after it was vacated by former school board president Gloria Karmun. As of Aug. 24, Brennan had filed to run again.
Although it is not part of the city election, those at the polls will also have the opportunity to vote for the Nome area representative to the NSEDC board. While voters and candidates must live within the city limits for the municipal and school positions, the NSEDC election will be conducted in accordance with the polling boundaries used for statewide elections.

This means residents of Banner Creek and other outlying areas near Nome may vote in and run for the NSEDC race. The current occupant of the seat with a three-year term is Don Stiles.
The boundaries of the district for statewide elections essentially extends along its southern edge from the mouth of Sinuk River to the west and the around the Solomon River to the east. To the north, the boundary runs to the southwest corner of the Bering Land Bridge National Preserve.

Saying it Sincerely

By Revs. David and Julie Elmore, Community United Methodist Church

“Living Wisely”
Scripture Reference: Ephesians 5:15-20
Discerning between the voices of foolishness and wisdom is not always easy. Ephesians 5:15-20 is a type of literature known as wisdom literature. Other pieces of wisdom literature in our Bible are Job, Ecclesiastes, and Proverbs; some scholars even include John's Gospel in that category. Coincidentally, this brief passage of wisdom literature is about wisdom, or more precisely, it contrasts the wisdom of living as part of the Body of Christ that we call the church with the foolishness of living in the ways that the world outside of God's reign tempt us to live that we know are not what God desires for us. This is a question that the church has struggled with since the very beginning of the church and some Jews struggled with even before Christ's coming.
The author of Ephesians gave the readers of this general letter some advice on how not to be “misled” by the foolish people. Rather than being misled by drunkenness and other bad behavior, we are to be filled with the spirit and praise God in word, in song and any other way we can. And we are to constantly give thanks to God for all things, as often as we are able, in as many ways as we are able.
Even before Jesus, there was a group of Jews who were so concerned about being led astray by the foolish behavior of those less devout than themselves that they moved far away from “civilization” and they built their own city. They were known as the Essenes, and they wanted to remain wise and not be misled by those whom they viewed as foolish while they awaited their Messiah. And it is courtesy of them that we have the Dead Sea Scrolls.

As the body of Christ we grow in wisdom as we worship and pray together. There is a concept of ubuntu in South Africa, which Archbishop Desmond Tutu defines as: “It is to say ‘My humanity is caught up, is inextricably bound up, in yours.’ We belong in a bundle of life. We say, ‘A person is a person through other persons.’ It is not ‘I think, therefore I am.’ It is rather: ‘I am human because I belong. I participate, I share.’” Now if I understand Alaskan Native spirituality correctly, I believe they have a very similar concept – but even more expansive. I am not human just because of my interactions with humans, I am human because of my interactions with all the created world around me – fish, game, and land. It is a concept of caring for all of God's creation. So, part of being wise is being able to recognize that all that we are and all that we do affects others in our community and world. One would grow in grace not just by treating one another well, but would grow in grace as we worship God and care for all that God has created.

Nome, but we have mobilized numerous projects through Nome for school projects in St. Michael, Golovin, Elim, Stebbins, Unalakleet, Teller, Gambell and Wales,” said NCI Project Manager Gary Donnelly. “We look forward to keeping our feet on the ground in Nome.”

Piscoya also lauded Neeser’s past work in the state. “Their record is very good. And because they are based in Alaska, they are going to stay here and not take the money and run somewhere out of state.”

Neeser has built several high-profile projects in the state, including Anchorage’s new Dena’ina Civic and Convention Center. The firm has also worked on plenty of health care projects. “Neeser Construction Inc. has extensive experience working with Alaska Native entities to provide improved health care services,” said NCI CEO Jerry Neeser in a press release. “It’s been our pleasure to work with several other health care organizations on similar facilities, including the Anchorage Native Primary Care Center Phases I and II, along with others throughout the state.”

As the frost on Nome windshields in recent mornings signals the impending close of the construction season, Donnelly said Inuit-NCI will make the most of what time remains before the snow flies. Much of what will be accomplished this fall will be work to allow a quick start in the spring, he said. “We expect to be doing some steel shakeout and lay-down, and set up of offices,” Donnelly said. “We will be doing as much preparatory work as the weather will allow short of vertical construction of the building.”

While the exact timing will be determined by the weather, Donnelly said steel erection is planned for next spring.

GROUNDWORK—The pilings that will support the new Norton Sound Regional Hospital are seen in this file photo from last spring. The Indian Health Service has awarded the contract to build the new 150,000-square-foot, three-story structure to Inuit Services Inc., a subsidiary of Bering Straits Native Corp., and Neeser Construction Inc.

Straits Vice President Gail Schubert could say yet how many jobs would be created through the construction project. Donnelly was able to say, however, that the project would require 30,000 man-days of work to be accomplished. Those man-days of work are expected to be accomplished by 2012.

As for jobs for area residents, the project was awarded with a stipulation for preferential hiring for Native workers. “Since the hospital services our region, we have a vested interest in constructing a facility that we can all be proud of, and that employs the greatest number of shareholders and regional residents as possible in the construction process,” Schubert said.

To that end, Nome Eskimo Community will be working with the project for training, employment referral and monitoring services to ensure Indian Preference mandates are followed. “They’re going to work with Nome Eskimo Community for positions,” Piscoya said. “There’s no guarantee on hiring but at least the lines of communication are open.”

Some of the work will be performed by union workers. “There will be both union and non-union trades on the project,” Donnelly said. “There are recruitment and training opportunities under either situation.”

This will be the first time NCI and Inuit have worked together on a project. Schubert said BSNC made the first move to form the joint venture. “This partnership came about after I contacted Jerry Neeser to ask if he had an interest in partnering with us to build the new hospital,” she said. “Neeser Construction Inc. has an excellent reputation and significant prior experience in medical facilities and rural construction.”

Schubert said the details of exactly what roles each company will play in the project are still being worked out. “In short, Inuit and NCI each have responsibilities as principals in the venture,” Donnelly said. “Each will have labor, materials, subcontracting and services tasks that will keep us all very busy for the next three years.”

The bid by Inuit-NCI was among four submitted for the project, according to IHS spokeswoman Dianne Dawson. Rather than a sealed bid process, Dawson said the selection process resulted from a negotiated procurement “based on a combination of contractor qualifications and price.” Due to that negotiation process, Dawson said IHS would not release the dollar figure for the other bids.

While Inuit is a subsidiary of the regional Native corporation, it has grown to a size where it is no longer eligible for the Small Business Administration’s 8(a) preferential contracting program. The program, which has allowed large, no-bid government contracts for Alaska Native corporations and their subsidiaries, has been met with increased scrutiny over the last few years, most recently from Sen. Claire McCaskill and her oversight committee.

Inuit graduated from the 8(a) program two years ago, and the program had no role in the awarding of the hospital contract, Schubert said.

ity uncovered in that category, with a shortage of funding depreciation which showed as an operating loss of $2.3 million.

Notably, and not surprisingly, diesel fuel was the single largest expense to the utility. Higher prices pushed up the fuel surcharge per kilowatt-hour, which in turn pushed up power revenue. Higher prices paid for diesel fuel also increased the value of existing tank inventory. The fuel surcharge absorbed by consumers went up by almost $2.2 million, 2008 over 2007. Revenues from electricity sales increased by $1.3 million. Water and sewer revenues increased by only $143,837.

Although the larger fuel picture showed a noticeable reduction in 2008 fuel prices from 2007, and prices continue to trend lower in 2009, “the price for fuel was higher in 2008 than in 2007 to NJUS,” according to NJUS Manager John K. Handeland. NJUS tanks receive fuel only during the summer barge season, preventing any savings if fuel prices drop at other times.

“The price is currently coming down in 2009,” Handeland said. “Our intention is to bring in some cheaper fuel this fall to lower the average cost. This will be passed along as a surcharge reduction this winter.”

NJUS bought significant quantities of fuel during the year, counting on supplying energy to Rock Creek Mine, which then closed down operations. This required additional fuel financing from Wells Fargo Bank.

NJUS made continual improvements in generation, sewer and water infrastructure over the two years. To this end, NJUS put to work $9.6 million in federal and state funding. In 2008, the utility took out three sewer and water loans through the state Department of Environmental Conservation for $6.4 million, but with a favorable interest rate of 1.5 percent. The payback term is 20 years with annual payments in September. Some of this money was used to pay a loan from the local Wells Fargo Bank.

Accounts receivable entry was way up, because NovaGold Resources paid a whopping bill of $1.9 million after closing of the audit period, Dec. 31, 2008. The mining company satisfied that debt in full earlier this summer.

At the end of the audit, NJUS received two points of counsel:

First, on internal control over journal entries to show prevention or detection of financial statement misstatements on a timely basis. Although any of three individuals had access and ability to complete all aspects of processing journal entries, there was no documentation of review by a second individual, signature or initials, as example.

In 2009, that issue has been covered by a monthly journal entry summary report reviewed and signed by two individuals to show that a review of entries has happened. NJUS keeps these double-check documents for the auditors. “We consider this finding resolved,” Bost of Mikunda Cottrell told the NJUS board Aug. 18.

Second, the audit noted that some grant revenues recorded in the current year related to grant expenditures made in previous years, due to late filing of grant reimbursement requests after the year in which the expenditures occurred. To facilitate accounting, Bost said, revenues should be matched to expenditures on a timely basis. That said, Bost inferred he understood the intricacies of scheduling projects against funding schedules.

A serious criticism, that NJUS did not receive, would be a significant deficiency that would affect an entity’s ability to report financial data reliably. An even more serious deficiency, that NJUS did not receive, a material weakness, results in more than a remote likelihood that a material misstatement of financial statements would not be detected.

NJUS accounts connect to the City of Nome as an enterprise fund, set up to account for operations financed and operated much like a private business, where the cost of providing goods and services is funded by customer fees.

Arctic and ocean policies are needed

By Diana Haecker

A week before senior-level officials of the Obama administration's Interagency Ocean Task Force, Alaska Senators and other Washingtonian VIP's descended on Alaska, climate-change-related bad news hit the wires, underscoring the timeliness of their visits. In Fairbanks, UAF researchers warned that increased ocean acidification caused by the absorption of greenhouse gases may wreak havoc with crustaceans, affecting everything up the food chain, including Alaska's profitable pollock and salmon fisheries.

Out of the Arctic Research Consortium office, also based in Fairbanks, came the news that the polar cap sea ice looks like it will continue to melt down to 1.7 million square miles, representing a near-record minimum.

"Warm, clear conditions led to significant sea ice melt during the month of July, with some areas of unusually low ice extent and an atmospheric pattern that promotes summer sea ice loss in the Pacific sector of the Arctic," the report said.

The U.S. National Snow and Ice Data Center said last Wednesday that this year's ice melt won't be as bad but close to the summer of 2007, when the ice cover from a winter maximum of more than 5.4 million square miles melted to just 1.6 million. And then news came from the National Climatic Data Center in North Carolina stating the observation that the world's ocean surface temperature was the warmest on record for June since record keeping began in 1880. This year's average ocean temperature reached 62.56°F, more than 1°F higher than the average of 61.5°F in the last century.

Researchers link both the acidification and warming trends to man made greenhouse gases.

To grapple with consequences of climate change and its effects on the oceans and the Arctic, two separate field hearings from high-level government officials drew the whole spectrum of stakeholders to Anchorage last week. Sen. Lisa Murkowski invited testimony at a hearing dealing with formulating an Arctic policy on Thursday, followed on Friday by the first of its kind hearing of the White House's interagency Ocean Policy Task Force. The hearings drew industry and environmental advocates as well as agency officials, Native leaders and private citizens.

Lisa Murkowski as a member of the US Senate subcommittee on Homeland Security addressed the strategic importance of the Arctic in US policy. She said in her opening remarks that it's a constant battle to educate Americans that the U.S. is – via Alaska – an Arctic nation with a significant stake in the future of the arctic. Murkowski said that with diminishing sea ice, the Arctic is more accessible and increased transportation, oil and gas development, mineral extraction, tourism and research needs new infrastructure in the region.

One of the first to testify, new Governor Sean Parnell urged the committee to view resources, national and homeland security, science and foreign policy as issues that are inextricably linked. Parnell favored a balanced approach to "protect our food sources, thousands of jobs and the energy security provided by Alaska's oil and mineral development" and said he urges the committee to grant Alaska a seat at the table when drafting an Arctic policy. He said that when it comes to resources, Alaska is America's energy breadbasket. "We have traditional and renewable sources of energy in staggering volumes here," Parnell said. "Alaska can play an even greater role in reducing the amount of oil and gas we import from abroad. And we can be America's test bed for renewable and alternative energy sources."

He endorsed offshore oil and gas development, both offshore and at the National Petroleum Reserve and the Arctic National Wildlife Reserve, but also underlined the state's commitment to develop alternative and renewable energy production.

Kicking off their Alaska listening tour, Coast Guard Admiral Thad Allen accompanied NOAA administrator Dr. Jane Lubchenco to Nome and on to Shishmaref to view coastal erosion issues. "By reaching out to the communities and asking 'what do you need?'" we found out that we can do things at very low cost that would really make a difference there," Allen said.

Allen asked of the committee to consider beefing up Coast Guard capabilities. For starters, he said that the entire US icebreaker fleet consists of three icebreakers, the Polar Sea, the Polar Star and the research vessel Healy. The Polar Star is currently in repair. Allen said he questions if three icebreakers are enough and said that the Dept. of Defense suggested six icebreakers. But before asking for new equipment and funding, he asked the committee to formulate solid mission requirements. "We need to figure out our capabilities and what we need to fulfill our missions," Allen said. Allen commended Mayor Denise Michels for the efforts to deepen Nome's port, saying that policy makers need to take a look at infrastructure along the vast Alaskan coast.

"For larger Coast Guard ships, the last refueling stop is Kodiak. The Arctic is 900 or 1,100 miles from the gas station and those are the types of things we need to talk about," Allen said. Responding to the need for a beefed up Coast Guard, Murkowski introduced two new bills to push for navigation aids, oil spill prevention and response, search and rescue, vessel tracking and funding to build two new heavy icebreakers. The other bill proposes to fund monitoring coastal changes and mapping Arctic waters.

Currently, there are eight arctic nations vying for a piece of the Arctic pie.

However, there is not an international law on the books that spells out the rules because the US Congress has not yet ratified and made official the so-called UN Convention on the Law of the Sea. Parnell said that so far in history, the Arctic has been both ungoverned and ungovernable. He urged the Senate to ratify the Law of the Sea. While Russia, Canada, Denmark and Norway have legally laid claims to Arctic territory, the US has not. Once ratified, the US could claim jurisdiction over the offshore continental shelf beyond the current 200-mile zone measured from the coastline.

Ocean Task Force

A day later, White House Council on the Environmental Quality chair Nancy Sutley, National Oceanic and Atmospheric Agency administrator Dr. Jane Lubchenco, David Hayes, deputy Secretary of the Interior as well as Coast Guard commandant Adm. Allen heard testimony from at least 60 Alaskans at Anchorage's Denaina Center.

There were voices from the industry saying that Alaska is American's energy future as vast oil and gas resources may become recoverable when the ice diminishes. Also, the oil and gas lobby connected homeland security to oil and gas development as to make America less dependent on foreign oil. The executive director of the Alaska Oil and Gas Association Marilyn Crockett said that energy must be included in the mix formulating a national ocean policy and urged the committee to make sure that the multiple uses of the oceans continues.

Other voices asked the committee to curb new industrial development and to protect the unique marine life as well as indigenous cultures that made their home in the Arctic, depending on the bounty of the ocean for thousands of years.

Nancy Sutley heads the interagency ocean task force with the tall order to come up with a new national ocean policy by December 10. A letter signed by President Obama in June spelled out the goals of the task force, namely to protect, maintain and restore ocean and coastal resources, to recommend adaptation strategies to climate change and to develop interagency cooperation. Dave Hayes said in his opening remarks, "the oceans can no longer be treated like an orphan," Hayes said. "They need our concerted and consolidated attention."

A panel of Alaskans gave speeches before handing the mikes over to the public in the three-hour hearing. The panel included Vera Metcalf, director of the Eskimo Walrus Commission, Larry Hartig, commissioner of the Alaska Department of Environmental Conservation; Dorothy Childers, Alaska Marine Conservation Council; former Governor Bill Sheffield, UAA chancellor and former Lt. Governor Fran Ulmer, and Alaska Cruise Association president John Binkley.

Metcalf, also a commissioner of the US Arctic Research Commission, urged the task force to bolster arctic research in the fields of climate change and the Bering Sea, arctic human health, arctic infrastructure needs and indigenous languages and cultures. Metcalf also stressed to recognize and consult with Alaska Native organizations and to grant the arctic people a seat at the table. "Finally, my recommendation for an ocean policy is, that along with specific research policies and plans, that include Arctic people, to support our unique, cultural and traditional bond with our world. To support our efforts to be involved in scientific research, monitoring conditions and knowing that all things are interconnected," Metcalf said.

North Slope Borough mayor Edward Itta thanked the task force for coming out to Barrow and said that there are plenty of reasons for distress for his people. Many reasons stem from climate change to multi-year ice melting and exposing resources, tourism and shipping lanes, he said. "We are trying to preserve our claim to the ocean. It truly is our garden. The oceans nourish our culture." He said that the Inupiaq people have lived through many changes and are not afraid of them. "But remember that we as a people are part of the environment and must be factored in accordingly," Itta said.

The Obama administration set the tone of a precautionary approach to dealing with the oceans and the Arctic last week when the Secretary of Commerce Gary Locke approved the Arctic Fishery Management Plan, curbing commercial fishing in the Arctic. While there are no large fisheries to speak of at this point, scientists have predicted a northward movement of sought after seafood species like pollock and crabs – and following them would be large fishing fleets. The plan prohibits commercial fishing in almost 200,000 square miles in the Beaufort and Chukchi Seas until scientists gather more information. On Monday, the Canadian newspaper National Post reported that Canada may follow the U.S. and may issue a possible moratorium on large-scale commercial fishing in the Beaufort Sea.

Murkowski calls for federal investment in Arctic

U.S. Senator Lisa Murkowski held a field hearing on the formulation of an Arctic Policy last week. After the hearing, Murkowski responded via e-mail to follow-up questions by The Nome Nugget reporter Diana Haecker.

Nome Nugget: What was the take-home message from testimony heard that you will bring back to Congress regarding the formulation of an Arctic policy?

Lisa Murkowski: "There are a number of take home messages - change is occurring rapidly in the Arctic but investment and infrastructure must be increased before human activity level increases even more. Replacing our aging ice breakers are just one of the substantial investments the federal government must make. There must also be increased investment in Arctic scientific research and oil spill research."

Nome Nugget: Besides the Arctic Marine Shipping Assessment (AMSA) and its recommendations, are there any Dept. of Defense recommendations to deal with the Arctic from border protection standpoint?

LM: "DoD and DHS [Dept of Homeland Security, ed.] are both working on an Arctic strategic plan and they should be released within the next 3 to 6 months."

Nome Nugget: Do you recommend beefing up the Coast Guard presence in the Arctic and installing a permanent presence in Nome (or Barrow)? Given that the Coast Guard plays a key role, how adequate are Coast Guard resources and what would they need to fulfill their multi-mission task in the Arctic?

LM: "The Coast Guard will be releasing a needs assessment which will have a plan to determine what assets they will need in the Arctic. I believe the Coast Guard will need a much larger presence in the region, but what that looks like and where it takes place is yet to be determined."

Nome Nugget: It was surprising to hear — again — that mainstream US does not consider America having a stake in the Arctic or being an Arctic nation. It reminds me of the "Horton hears a Who" story, and it's we Alaskans yelling "We are here." How do you think the perception (and with it a willingness to formulate a sensible Arctic policy) could be changed so that the US pays sufficient attention to the Arctic and Alaska?

LM: "While the Arctic has gained a much higher profile lately, the difficult tasks remains to communicate why the Arctic is important to America and "what does it mean to be an Arctic nation." We must do that through education and outreach. Educating the nation on the value and importance of the Arctic and how it relates to their lives is the message we must relay."

Nome Nugget: In your opinion, what should an Arctic policy entail and look like?

LM: "The Bush administration released a new Arctic Policy at the end of their administration. I provided input into that policy and believe it is a good blueprint. But implementation of the policy needs to take place with significant federal investment."

ders cost?" asked Smith.

"Not offhand," Harrelson replied. "When we review the budget we know NSSP will lose money, but the board bites the bullet to help fishermen."

Johnson said he submits a break-even budget for operation of the Unalakleet plant to the NSEDC board annually. Smith asked Johnson if that's how it works out. "We present everything to the board and they know," Johnson said.

"It would be good to know how it pencils out," Smith commented.

"The board knows," replied Johnson.

Joe Garnie of Teller, an NSEDC board member who recently became chairman of the NSSP Working Group, called the special meeting Aug. 18 because more issues were raised during the group's regular meeting July 29 than could be addressed in the two hours allocated for it. The working group meets in conjunction with quarterly meetings of the NSEDC board and its standing committees. The working group is not a standing committee, and its recommendations must be conveyed to and approved by a standing committee to be considered for approval by the full board.

Difficult fishing season

Some complaints aired by fishermen at the working group's July 29 meeting were anticipated by Garnie and the NSEDC administration. They knew fishermen were upset when the NSSP plant in Nome stopped buying crab for two weeks early in the season due to inadequate meat fill (skinny crab). Time solved that problem, but fishing remained slow, with most crabbers delivering smaller catches per trip than in previous years. Their cost ratio for fuel and bait increased in relation to catch revenues.

Commercial fishermen in southern Norton Sound had hoped for a huge run of pink salmon, but it did not show up. Chum runs in northern Norton Sound were among the worst on record, and in southern Norton Sound they were average. The commercial silver salmon run in southern Norton Sound is producing good catches, but they are well below the record commercial silver harvests of the previous three years.

NSEDC administrators offered to reduce fish ticket deductions for loan repayments from 50 percent to 25 percent on request. The company provides a revolving loan program for local commercial fishermen at low interest rates. One program funds large vessel loans, and the other funds loans for vessel and equipment upgrades and for purchasing fishing gear, outboard motors and certain commercial fishing permits. The company's board of directors has approved end-of-season bonuses for fishermen despite NSSP's annual losses.

Some fishermen told Garnie they have made complaints and suggestions to NSEDC and received no response. Garnie asked the fishermen to submit written complaints and recommend remedies for problems. Harrelson also asked for written and constructive comments.

At the Aug. 18 meeting, Thomas said he had switched from crab to halibut fishing because in a three-day trip he could harvest only 800 pounds of crab compared to 3,000 pounds of halibut. In past years most or all of the allowable harvest of Norton Sound red king crab has been caught by late August when the halibut fishery begins. However, this year the open access crab fishery harvest totaled 209,625 pounds on Aug. 22, with 137, 250 pounds of quota still in the water. "The catch is well below recent years for this date and the trend line indicates the quota will be caught by approximately Sept. 20," said Jim Menard, Norton Sound and Kotzebue area manager for the Alaska Department of Fish and Game.

Following are excerpts of Thomas's written complaints, most of which were discussed at the Aug. 18 meeting.

Skinny crab, lower price

"[The] grounds price was reduced from $3.27 to $2.25 during the early crab season due to 'skinny crab' for one delivery prior to operations shutdown," Thomas wrote. "I personally took a $700 deduction from this delivery. I feel that the reasoning for the deduction was that the crab would all be considered "A" grade [instead of the superior fancy grade] due to a 15 percent skinny crab ratio....

"I do not approve of the current management policy to try and balance the books by gouging the harvester through grounds price reduction or otherwise," Thomas continued. "The overall social benefits of sustaining a struggling fleet economy outweigh the need to balance the financial bottom line of NSSP."

Thomas voiced that complaint at the July 29 NSSP Working Group meeting, and Garnie asked him to put it in writing. It was not discussed at the Aug. 18 meeting.

High-priced imported bait

"NSSP ran out of bait herring during [the] crab season and then ordered poor quality bait for [the] long line season at 95 cents per pound compared to the status quo price of 50 cents for superior local caught herring," Thomas wrote. "NSSP management was told by expert advisors on the NSSP working group committee to harvest 100,000 pounds of herring for the crab and long line season, yet management only acquired 50,000 pounds and ran out, thusly causing hardship for the harvester. Also it was brought to my attention that bait was rationed in Savoonga at three boxes per day when harvesters needed more."

Harrelson told Thomas that NSSP would not recover costs for the imported bait by charging fishermen 95 cents a pound for it. He said it cost $11,000 to ship the bait from the East Coast to Anchorage and $29,000 to ship it from Anchorage to Nome.

Ferry said NSSP started the season with 50,000 pounds of frozen herring left over from last year and additional bait. "We had in the neighborhood of 100,000 pounds," he said. Fishermen insisted that the plant should not have run out of bait. "If there are 200,000 pounds of herring in the freezer, where will we put the crab?" Ferry asked. No one replied.

Garnie said herring should show up before long in the Teller area and will be available until freeze up. The discussion turned to the merits of various types of bait.

Charging for loader use

"NSSP has acquired a front-end loader," Thomas wrote. "I was told that I would have to pay $150 an hour for the use of the loader and operator to pull my boat out for maintenance. I have personally helped NSSP pull their tender boats in and out of the water for many years and have never charged NSSP a single penny. Why are the harvesters being charged this amount of money to use the loader and operator? The operator is paid $25 per hour. I was told that NSSP would charge the same as the local vendor, Q Trucking. Why is NSSP management trying to increase the profit ... of NSSP by gouging the harvesters?"

Ferry said NSSP charges $155 per hour for use of the loader, $5 more than Q Trucking, to avoid competing with the firm. Harrelson said NSEDC's insurance requires a specific certification for the loader's driver, and he is reluctant to just let anyone operate it. Thomas said the issue is about taking care of local fishermen, not about avoiding competition with local vendors. Smith said the loader is a small issue and fishermen should not be changed for its use.

Steve Ivanoff, a member of the NSSP Working Group from Unalakleet, asked if NSSP's loader use fee is intended to cover insurance. Harrelson said the fee covers insurance, maintenance and the cost of the driver. "I don't think NSEDC is making any money off it," he added.

"Do you pay the City of White Mountain $150 an hour to take your boat in and out of the water?" fisherman Eric Osborne asked Harrelson. "No," answered Harrelson. "So you think we should?" asked Osborne. Harrelson did not reply.

Smith and Garnie suggested that NSEDC prepare a written policy for use of the loader. Thomas said use of the loader for subsistence fishing should be incorporated into the policy. "I want to see a definition of what this program is all about—how we can work together," he said.

NSEDC's policies questioned

"I have written numerous letters and e-mails on the benefits of social economic vs. the bottom line business economic practices of past and current NSSP management," Thomas noted in his written complaint. "I assume that the NSEDC board of directors dictates policy. I have never received a formal answer to my policy questions from the board. (I assume the letter to staff never made it to the board.)" Thomas said the verbal responses he receives from staff when he confronts them on these issues are "indifferent if not belittling to the harvester."

Harvesters are constantly on the verge of bankruptcy, but NSSP is backed by huge profits from NSEDC's pollock harvests, Thomas said. He sees the economic survival of harvesters as the fundamental purpose of the CDQ program.

"...NSSP has always been operating in the red and probably always will with the economy as it is," Thomas wrote. "Instead of worrying that NSSP will never be self-sustaining on paper, the board should be concerned that the pollock industry remains profitable so that proceeds can subsidize local fishing economies, which in turn provide valuable social economics to the region. In my mind, social economics far outweigh the importance of [the] NSSP profit/loss statement. Money that is put into the community in jobs and food on the table is an economic multiplier. Where else in this economy will NSEDC see their investment multiply 300-400 percent annually within the region?"

Smith said Thomas is posing questions that the NSEDC board needs to deal with in writing. A policy is needed on how NSEDC is to address the local fisheries economy, he added. "Just set a price and go with it," Smith suggested. "Pay [fishermen] $4 a pound for crab and NSSP will recover what it can. You're gonna lose money anyway."

Johnson said the Unalakleet plant pays 95 cents a pound for silver salmon, 35 cents a pound for chum and 25 cents a pound for pinks delivered to the dock. For salmon delivered to a tender, the plant pays 90 cents a pound for silvers, 30 cents a pound for chums and 20 cents a pound for pinks. He tries to be fair and makes adjustments to prices based on the ups and downs of the market, he added.

"If NSEDC ever goes away, [the plant] needs to be sustainable in the long run," Johnson said. He predicted that if NSEDC were to subsidize fishermen, 100 more of them would sign up to fish.

Smith, Osborne and another fisherman pressed for financial information about NSSP. Harrelson said he would have to ask NSEDC's Finance Committee whether the information is propriety or can be released. Osborne said there may be hidden costs for running the plants in addition to tender costs.

"The concern I have is we find out and the board says we can't operate the plant and puts fishermen out of business," said Ivanoff. "If this gets out and people are upset [about] losing too much on these fisheries, they'll say, 'Let's choke them and put them out of business.'"

"We can't be losing enough money to say close the plant at this point," Smith said.

"That's your interpretation," replied Ivanoff.

Sport fishing for coho salmon curtailed

Nome may have gold, but silvers are elusive

By Tyler Rhodes

The tale of the coho salmon in Norton Sound this year reads a bit like a Dickens novel.

Outside of the Nome subdistrict, the silver fishing has been among the best of times.

Around Nome, it has been about the worst.

"Everywhere is doing good except the black hole of Nome," said Jim Menard of the Alaska Department of Fish and Game's Nome office.

In response to the poor return of silvers, the department shut down the sport fishery as of midnight Aug. 24 in the marine waters and the drainages between Topkok Head and Cape Rodney. This includes the Sinuk, Cripple, Penny, Snake, Nome, Flambeau, Eldorado, Bonanza and Solomon rivers.

The Fish and Game order also bans the use of bait while sport fishing for any other species and by subsistence fishermen still pursuing cohos.

The order, however, does not close the subsistence fishery in the area. But even that, too, has been restricted to hook-and-line fishing only; nets are no longer allowed. Those subsistence fishing with hook and line must also adhere to sport fishing methods, such as not snagging the fish.

Meanwhile, the tale in the region outside of Nome tells another story. A Fish and Game Aug. 23 commercial fishing update labeled it as "another banner year as the commercial harvest of 70,470 silvers ranks eighth all time."

The Aug. 23 commercial fishing data for most of the area's subdistricts gives an idea of the bounty elsewhere in the region. The commercial silver harvest of 2,437 fish in the Golovin subdistrict ranks at a fourth all-time high. The commercial fishery for coho in the Moses Point, or Elim area, has set a record at 6,511 silvers. Norton Bay had its second silver commercial harvest in 20 years which ranked third in size with more than 1,700 silvers compared to harvests from 1975 through 1988.

The fish count on the region's rivers where there are weirs or towers also paints the contrasting picture well. As of Aug. 24, the North River tower near Unalakleet had counted nearly 12,000 silvers go by. More than 1,700 of those fish went by on Aug. 22. On the Kwiniuk River approximately 10 miles northeast of Elim, 6,300 silvers were counted. On the Niukluk River near Council, 5,400 silvers had passed by.

On the other hand, the Nome River had only seen 300 silvers pass by its weir as of Monday. The Snake River count was at a paltry 30 and only half of that had been counted at the Pilgrim River weir. "We've only have had two years lower at the Nome," Menard said. "We've had one year lower at the Snake in the 15 years we've been counting at the Snake."

Menard said those years were 2003 and 1997 for the Nome River and 2002 for the Snake. However, 2004 and 2005 showed strong returns, which should have set the area rivers up well for this year. Menard said the silvers mostly return on a four-year cycle.

As for theories on why this year's return is so poor, Menard said ideas being tossed about include flooding in 2005 that could have displaced eggs or a hard freeze that winter which could have had an effect in the area's shallow rivers. Low water in the rivers up through mid-August has also been mentioned as possible problem, keeping the returning salmon out.

Recent rains may have helped with the last item, as Menard said a small pulse was noticed. "We had a little push in the Nome River," he said. "We had a couple of hundred through this weekend, that got us up a little better."

While there is a chance for the run to improve and the sport fishing order to be lifted, Menard said time is running out. "We still have a little bit of 'late' left in this game. We're not out of 'late' yet," he said Monday. The historic midpoint for the fishery, however, comes at the end of this week. At that point the department will evaluate whether or not to suspend the subsistence fishery.

The move to stop the sport fishery is not unprecedented, nor would it be to do so with the subsistence fishery, Menard said. The sport fishery was closed in 2003, as was the subsistence fishery. Menard also said the subsistence fishery was closed in 2002.

As of Aug. 25, however, the subsistence fishery was still on. The subsistence fishery is only open to Alaska residents. Residents must obtain a free permit from the Fish and Game office to be allowed to subsistence fish; this includes elders who are using permanent licenses since those licenses are for sport fishing.

From health care to caribou

Listening session with Sen. Begich's staff brings out a multitude of concerns

By Tyler Rhodes

Nome community members and representatives from a number of the region's organizations had a chance Aug. 20 to deliver their concerns and requests to Sen. Mark Begich.

Approximately two dozen Nomeites showed to voice their concerns that covered everything from health care to caribou.

Begich's rural director Tiffany Zulkowski and legislative assistant Megan Foster were in Nome last week to meet with the organizations that form the Bering Strait Leadership Team and conduct the public meeting at the Pioneer Hall on Front Street. Begich's staff members were present primarily to relay the concerns and comments to the senator and not specifically answer questions.

The issue of health care came up in a couple of different forms during the listening session. Early comments were addressed toward the proposed revamping of the nation's health care system. The namesakes of local law firm Lewis and Thomas brought up the increased cost to provide health care for themselves and the employees of their small business.

Both Bob Lewis and Connor Thomas advocated some sort of public option at the federal level. Lewis pointed out that publically financed health care already covers many Alaskans. "[Indian Health Service] provides a huge benefit to a number of people in the room," Lewis said. "We, for all intended purposes, have a single-payer system for the majority of people in this town."

Lewis, who said he has seen the premiums for his business's health care plan increase five-fold, encouraged Sen. Begich to use Alaska's experience with public health care as an example of how such a system can work.

Loretta Bullard, president of Kawerak Inc., noted that it isn't simply small businesses and individuals who are struggling to keep up with skyrocketing insurance premiums. Bullard noted that the deductible in the plan held by the large tribal organization she leads has ballooned to $3,000. That growth is on top of a doubling of the premium on the plan compared to what was paid in 2000.

Regarding another aspect of health care, Norton Sound Health Corp. board member Berda Willson lauded the work at the federal level to get funding for Nome's new hospital. While excited about the new facility, Willson is concerned about finding personnel once it opens. "Now we're looking at how are we going to staff this hospital," she said. Willson questioned the ability to fund training programs for people in the region to get jobs in the health care industry.

Willson also expressed concern about reduced funding allocated for the Denali Commission. The federally funded commission has allowed for the construction of rural clinics. "We have villages that house clinics that should not be used for a clinic," she said.

Norton Sound Health Corp.'s Roy Agloinga said the Denali Commission has helped with the planning phase for six planned clinics in the region. He said reduced funding may mean only one of those planned clinics gets built. He also voiced concern about lease funds granted for existing clinics. The money directed for the lease and maintenance of clinic sites is not keeping up with the actual costs, he said. "All of our clinics are operating in the red in regard to village lease funds," he said.

Tim Towarak's request to the senator's staff was more a call for the status quo than for any change. The president and chief executive officer of Bering Straits Native Corp. asked that the Small Business Administration's federal contracting provision regarding minority groups, known as the 8(a) program, be retained. Towarak lauded Begich's efforts so far in defending the rules that give preferential treatment to Alaska Native corporations as they face scrutiny in Congress. "I would still like to challenge him to retain that program as it is without any changes," Towarak said.

Foster said Begich had vigorously defended the 8(a) program in a hearing held by Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., who has been highly critical of the program. She pledged that he would continue to advocate for its continuance. "I think our biggest concern is Sen. McCaskill is not going to go away," she said.

On another front, Kawerak's Robert Keith advocated that federal funding be directed to local groups and agencies to conduct research, such as studies related to climate change, rather than first being directed to the state. "I don't think the state should be getting these funds. I think we should be doing our own research," he said.

Kawerak's Bullard echoed those comments, noting that many federal funds destined directly for rural projects, are now reduced as they pass through the state's hands. "The federal funds that were once earmarked directly for programs are now siphoned off by the state," she said.

Keith also called for more attention being given to the potential for oil spills in Arctic waters as shipping increases in the region with the reduction in ice coverage. Foster said the senator agrees with the need to formulate a plan, noting the multiple pieces of legislation concerning the Arctic that Begich recently introduced in the Senate. "We need to be prepared. We don't want to wait for something to happen," she said.

Also in regard to the oceans, Tim Smith of the Nome Fishermen's Association was critical of the legislation renewing the Community Development Quota groups, such as Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. Smith said he believed there is too little oversight of the groups. He also cited problems with the pollock industry's harvesting of salmon, known as bycatch, which would otherwise be heading into rivers and supporting both rural economies and subsistence needs. He added that the CDQ groups' participation in the pollock industry puts them in an awkward position of advocating more for the pollock industry's concerns than rural residents' when it comes to the bycatch issue.

Nome's Chick Trainor led off the afternoon's discussion, speaking on energy issues. Trainor lauded the move toward embracing renewable energy with the construction of the Banner Ridge wind farm just outside of Nome. Trainor, however, described the turbines as maintenance-intensive and wondered if more could be done toward the development of geothermal power from Pilgrim Hot Springs or natural gas deposits both on and off shore. "We do need assistance in our fuel and heating needs," Trainor said. Others in the room also pushed for more development of renewable energy.

Trainor also advocated searching out and developing oil deposits onshore on the peninsula to help meet local energy demands.

Nome's Derek Leedy voiced concern over the legacy of past resource extraction, speaking specifically to his concerns of the former mercury mine at Red Devil on the Kuskokwim River. He asked for the senator's support in seeing the mine which closed in 1971 become a Super Fund site. Besides providing for the cleanup of the area, Leedy said making the area a Super Fund site would create jobs in the area that could last for a number of years.

Roy Ashenfelter also spoke at the session, advocating funding for the Western Arctic Caribou Herd Working Group. He said the herd, which numbers anywhere from 390,000 to 450,000 animals is an important source of food for subsistence hunters from the Interior to Western Alaska and on up to the North Slope, following the herd's migration route. He said the working group—which includes conservationists, subsistence hunters and sport hunters, among others—has requested $200,000 in federal funds. He said that amount pales in comparison to requests from the recently passed federal stimulus package. "One of the reasons it may not be getting much attention is that the request is so small," he said. "But the benefits behind it is huge."

Begich's staff, Foster and Zulkowski, said the concerns heard in Nome echo those they have heard in other parts of the state. Topping the list in most locations, they said, are comments regarding energy issues, health care reform and subsistence use of fish.

Utility continues to examine alternative energy

Nome Joint Utility System investigates use of batteries, prime location for wind power

By Sandra L. Medearis

With an audit of books that underlined an increase of $2 million for generator diesel fuel charges for spending year 2008, Nome's utility board continues to hash over alternative energy sources.

However, the bottom line is that the diesel generators will continue to spin for some years before any other feasible energy comes into operation. Additionally, any alternative energy would be complementary to diesel generation, in order to ensure consistent power availability, local board members say.

Independence from diesel fuel is possible, but at high cost, Nome Joint Utility System board member Carl Emmons observed at the Aug. 18 board meeting. Still, NJUS staff and board continue studies of the area's wind resources, pending the development of feasible wind turbine operation to have wind in its sales. This month, NJUS and Banner Wind Farm representatives met with funding agency Denali Commission to seek money for linking the BWF production with the utility's grid. BWF wind turbines are scheduled to go back online in October after modifications have been done.

NJUS manager John Handeland brought up the possibility that the utility might be able to top off available tank capacity this fall on last barges of the season if the price of fuel continues to drop.

"That would reduce our average cost and bring down our fuel surcharge," he said.

Nome ratepayers currently pay 19 cents per kilowatt-hour on usage up to 500 kwh after a

"I think we're wasting our money on a lot of windmills. We need to put our money where there is a better return."

— NJUS Board Member Fred Moody

subsidy of 17 cents from the state, compared to Kotzebue's rate at about a dime more, and Golovin's price of about a half dollar per kwh.

Meanwhile, NJUS will be installing a wind monitoring device on the coastal lowlands, somewhere between Nome and Safety, to complement a monitor already in operation. This current monitor tower will be moved from the Snake River valley to Newton Peak. Some studies elsewhere have shown that while wind is more brisk at higher elevations, it blows at more consistent velocities at low levels. The Alaska Energy Authority has the second wind study tower in storage and available, but before it can go up, property location and access, FAA and federal Fish and Wildlife clearance will have to be addressed.

Board member Fred Moody doesn't think the answer is blowing in the wind. He thinks the utility should be looking more at thermal energy at from Pilgrim Hot Springs and other hotspots, or researching natural gas in the area.

"I think we're wasting our money on a lot of windmills," he said. We need to put our money where there is a better return."

Utility staff and board are also investigating a new company that produces a catalyzing gas, that, injected into fossil fuels maximizes the energy output while reducing emissions from combustion, according to claims of Quad City Innovations. Representatives were to arrive in Nome this week. (See related story on this page.)

Should NJUS find the elusive answer to cheaper energy, storage of these kwh to meet fluctuating demand would be a major issue. The board has been studying a storage battery solution that would allow the utility to ramp up or ramp down its power according to need and generation. A storage battery system under review for future need would cost $1million per megawatt stored. Nome's demand for power runs at an average of 5 megawatts. Moody and Handeland have attended presentations by Altair Nano, makers of such a system, to be prepared for future potential funding applications.

"People don't want to be in the dark if the wind stops," Handeland said. "By having storage we could, when the peak load required us to add a generator, add an increment of power from storage." Handeland thought at the cost, supplementary storage would be more practical than providing for a full switchover of community demand.

In other business, the board:

Re-upped lobbyist Larry Markley's contract for another year. Markley will get $60,000 for the year plus reimbursable expenses—with no markup.

Received notice that NJUS staff had applied to state Department of Environmental Conservation for sewer and water money—$3.2 million—against a total project cost of $5.4 million for N and M streets between Fourth and Fifth avenues. Another application went in for $150,000 for a master plan-system capacity investigation.

Fuel from water? NJUS considers fuel booster

Idea behind claim has floated around for some time

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Joint Utility System executives this week looked forward to receiving representatives of a company that claims to know how to make an energizing gas from water and a small amount of electricity. This gas, according to company literature, can be injected into diesel fuel to make its efficiency impressively higher while reducing emissions measurably.

NJUS board members meeting Aug. 18 had shiny eyes, fascinated by the aspect of boosting the timing on power generators to burn less high-priced fuel more cleanly. Preliminary reports say the technique separates hydrogen from water and injects it into the air intake of generators.

The process, sometimes called hydrogen fuel enhancement, has intrigued tinkerers and inventors looking to make their fuel go farther since early in the last century.

"We've read about water made into wine at one time. If it can be made into fuel, that's wonderful, too," board member Carl Emmons observed. "I haven't seen any hard operation or measurable trial."

The trade name of the gas and the machine used to separate it is called Q-C Gas by developers Quad-City Innovations. QCI is based in Southfield, Minn.

QCI claims to answer the issue of expensive infrastructure to make and dispense hydrogen fuel. Their machine provides stand-alone, on-demand production, a less expensive way to deliver hydrogen to energy production. Contrast this with traditional methods that include manufacturing, storage, end-user handling, and transporting large amounts of flammable hydrogen. They say the cost compares favorably with hydro-electric power.

QCI says its product, QC (Quantum Catalyst, not Quad-City!)-Gas, can be used in virtually any application that uses natural gas, propane, diesel fuel or coal, and has been verified by responsible laboratories to increase overall energy efficiency in actual applications by as much as 60 percent.

QCI is able to guarantee at a minimum of 20 percent reduction of fossil fuel consumption in nearly all applications. QCI cites verification by a combustion/boiler research laboratory, Fossil Energy Research Corp.—FERCo—not to be confused with Federal Energy Regulatory Commission—FERC.

Hydrogen on demand is not a new idea. Charles H. Frazier of Columbus, Ohio, obtained a patent in 1918 for an apparatus to separate hydrogen and oxygen from water using electrodes and inject the gases into the intake manifold of a generator to increase fuel efficiency and cut down on emission of pollutants. The Jet Propulsion Laboratory produced a study called "On-board Hydrogen Generator for a Partial Hydrogen Injection Internal Combustion Engine" in 1975. NASA, in 1977, was looking into adding hydrogen to extend the lean operating range of gasoline, and finding a drop in emissions. During this decade, similar experiments and favorable results have come out of studies at University of Birmingham in England and Zhejiang University in China.

"We've read about water made into wine at one time. If it can be made into fuel, that's wonderful, too."

— NJUS Board Member Carl Emmons

The NJUS board hopes to know more about the possibility of adapting hydrogen fuel enhancement to the utility's power generators after talking to representatives this week.

Seven take the Anvil Challenge

Foreign guests fill the ranks in the 11th annual Anvil 59 Minute, 37 Second Challenge

By Tyler Rhodes

Ken Livingston was simply out for a run last Thursday when he ran into Leo Rasmussen at the base of Anvil Mountain.

Having no goal—other than getting a workout—the visiting New Zealander was surprised to have Rasmussen tell him that he was 11 minutes late. Already nearly five miles into his run and more than 10 minutes behind the rest of the pack, Livingston nonetheless accepted Rasmussen's challenge to become the seventh competitor in the 11th annual Anvil 59-Minute, 37-Second Challenge.

Livingston was rewarded for his effort with an emerald-colored trophy, as he was able to muscle to the top of the 834-foot climb and back down to the Dexter Road fast enough to take third place with a time of 41 minutes, 32 seconds. That time includes the 11 minutes that passed before he arrived at the start line.

The race is sponsored by Rasmussen's Music Mart.

Livingston wasn't the only participant adding international flare to the annual race. At the last minute, Jean-Michel Peuzin of France decided to join the ranks climbing to the top of Anvil Mountain and racing back down. Peuzin completed the course in 41:59.

While the visiting delegation were good sports in joining the small field of participants on a drizzly, gray Thursday evening, it was a Nome couple who led the charge. With the absence of the Nome-Beltz cross country team from the field—the Nanooks were preparing for Saturday's competition in Kotzebue—Tyler Rhodes was able to find his way to the finish line first in 25:42. Erika Eaton, Rhodes' fiancée, nabbed the runner-up honors overall and was the first woman to cross the line. The race put an exclamation point of the evening for Eaton, the Nanooks' assistant cross country coach, who had just completed an hour-long run with the team.

Nine-year-old Erik Handeland also nabbed a trophy as the first participant younger than 16 to finish. Handeland covered the course in 57:43. Filling out the ranks for the race were Christine Schultz, a constant at Nome races, who finished in 43:19, and Elise Rasmussen. Rasmussen, 7, summed up the event as she walked across the line just 11 seconds short of the race's namesake with a time of 59:26.

The race was started by Leo Rasmussen more than a decade ago to provide an event for area youth before they head back to school. Rasmussen walked the 2 3/4-mile course that climbs to the top of Anvil Mountain and back, clocking his time. When he made it back to the start, the clock was stopped at 59:37, giving the race its name. Since that first walk, runners and walkers of all stripes have been able to meet Rasmussen's challenge to beat his time, including David Spirtes pushing his 5-month-old daughter in a baby jogger and even a goose named Gonky.

While the 2009 running of the challenge may have attracted a couple foreign visitors, no animal competitors—geese or otherwise—were spotted on the course.

Sweet 15: Nanook harriers put up perfect score in Kotz

Nome-Beltz runners AnnieKate Olson, Jeremy Head stride to individual wins in season's first race

By Tyler Rhodes

Jeff Collins is hoping Saturday's performance by his Nanook runners is a sign of things to come.

The new head coach of the Nome-Beltz running program had to be smiling as he watched his runners nab individual titles and the boys sweep the top five spots to notch a perfect race in Kotzebue.

On the boys' side, Jeremy Head picked up right where he left off last season, leading the team to victory as he blazed the course in 17 minutes, 26 seconds. Head's teammates filled in the next four slots to sweep the race. Cross country races are scored by adding up the finishing positions of the team's top five runners. A score of 15 is the lowest and best possible result a team can achieve.

Head found his way to the finish line with a comfortable lead over fellow Nanook Teddy Payenna who finished at 18:04. The finish line was then quiet for nearly a minute and a half before the deluge of the next three Nanooks would come in. Emerson Conger, Nathan Blandford and Jeremiah Johnson rounded out the top five places to give Nome its perfect 15.

For the girls, AnnieKate Olson grabbed the girls' win with a time of 23:08, 14 seconds faster than her nearest competitor. Nome only entered two girls in the race and, thus, was unable to score as a team. That second runner, Caitlin Tozier, also showed a strong debut for the season, placing fourth at 25:38. According to Collins, the girls team will have two more girls for its next race at home, now that they have the required number of practices. This will leave the Lady Nanooks still short one runner for a full team.

Collins said the strong debut has him feeling optimistic about the remainder of the season. "After seeing their performance and what we've got for workouts in the future, I'd say we could be a top-three team at state," he said.

He also fosters high expectations for Olson. "After seeing AnnieKate race, we're going to get her ready for a region title," Collins said.

The Nanook runners will get to show off their strides this Friday with their home meet. Hosting runners from Chevak, Barrow, Kotzebue, Point Hope, Unalakleet, Shaktoolik and Teller, the races will get underway with the high school boys starting at 2:30 p.m. Races will be held at the Nome-Beltz complex. The girls will race at 3 p.m. The junior high and community race will be held together at 3:30 p.m. Anyone in the community is invited to participate in the last run.

Collins said due to construction near the high school, the course will be changed from previous years. Whether the course will be completely new or just modified a bit was not decided as of press time.

Bering Sea beaches get a scrubbing

By Tyler Rhodes

There is an ancient can of Budweiser beer that sits in Wes Jones' Unalakleet office. "It's so old—the top of it, you had to use a church key to open it," he said.

The empty can is not a reminder of some distant college party or sign of longtime allegiance to the King of Beers, but rather serves as an example of the age and variety of the flotsam that has landed on the beaches surrounding the Bering Sea.

Jones, a fisheries biologist for Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., said the can was likely deposited during a storm surge. The can's trip to his office came as part of a vast multi-year effort to clean debris from the shores surrounding the Bering Sea.

For three years now, NSEDC—on its own and with the support of partners—has worked to clean up the shores surrounding its 15 member communities. The effort has mainly been aimed at removing marine debris. The efforts so far have netted 355,000 pounds of material ranging from fishing nets of all shapes and sizes, abandoned boats, bottles and just plain garbage—even a Japanese Swiffer mop was found farther up Golovin Bay than the village of Golovin itself. "You look at 355,000 pounds, that's a lot of weight," Jones said. "Pretty much all of it is stuff that can float. So the volume of things is just huge."

Jones said the genesis of the project came in the early part of the decade when NSEDC board members from the eastern section of the region questioned whether old nets left in the rivers were having an effect on salmon runs. On their end, board members from the western communities remarked on the accumulation of plastics and other debris on their beach. "At that time, NSEDC employees were flying between Gambell and Savoonga and noticed nets," Jones said.

The concern was large enough for the board to call for action. "That's how our clean waters program was born," he said.

Called "ghost nets," abandoned fishing nets can imperil fish, marine mammals and even terrestrial animals and birds. Jones said more modern nets made of petroleum-based products remain in the environment much longer than their predecessors, which were made of cotton or other more biodegradable material. "Petroleum-based debris don't break down like the old stuff," Jones said.

Beyond nets, other plastic debris can also be damaging to animals. Jones said as the debris breaks up into smaller pieces, they can ingest it creating further problems. "I think humans over our history have had the attitude of 'throw it in the ocean and it disappears.' Maybe that worked when everything biodegraded," Jones said.

Another result of the more durable waste is that it gathers in greater and greater quantities. In the past, cleaning up the shore has not been a priority, he said. "We do a clean-up on land every year in most communities, but we don't do one in the marine environment," Jones said.

At the same time NSEDC was moving forward with its cleanup effort, the industry trade group the Marine Conservation Alliance was offering matching funds to organizations to clean up marine debris. For much of its cleanup work, NSEDC was able to employ funds from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration administered through the MCA Foundation. Work this summer again utilized NOAA funds, but this time the federal money came as a result of the recent federal stimulus package.

In 2006 NSEDC launched a pilot project in Unalakleet. According to NSEDC biologist Charlie Lean, that initial effort gave NSEDC a peek at just how much work was ahead of them. "It was an eye-opener in that we didn't even get close to getting done," Lean said.

After that initial 10-day pilot project, the next year NSEDC flew an aerial survey from the northern end of Bristol Bay to the Bering Strait to gauge the extent of the build-up on beaches. While the directive from the NSEDC board of directors calls for cleanups in and around each of the 15 member communities, Jones is keen to find the areas that are the most prone to accumulating debris. "One of the big things about the aerial survey is to look for collection locations. ... This is where debris ends up getting sucked in and really concentrated," Jones said. "If we keep going back every couple of years, we can clear out a whole bunch of stuff for not much money."

In the first full year of the program, 2007, cleanups occurred in Unalakleet, Shaktoolik and White Mountain. Golovin, Gambell and Savoonga received cleanups last year. On the list this year are Stebbins, St. Michael, Brevig Mission and continued work on St. Lawrence Island. Some initial work is slated for Little Diomede this summer before a more intense effort next year. Both Lean and Jones cite the complicated logistics of getting in, out and around Little Diomede for the two-step approach.

In addition to cleaner beaches and a safer environment for terrestrial animals, sea life and people, the effort has provided an economic boost for

Kawerak to put villages' marine subsistence users on the map

Northern Bering Sea tribes prepare input for federal research plan

By Laurie McNicholas

Local experts in subsistence use of Bering Sea resources in several Bering Strait villages soon will help develop maps depicting critical marine subsistence use areas and species habitat areas, reports Julie Raymond-Yakoubian, Kawerak's social scientist.

Kawerak, Inc. recently completed an agreement with the Alaska Marine Conservation Council and the Bering Sea Elders Advisory Group to participate in the mapping project. BSEAG members are tribes in coastal and island communities of the northern Bering Sea ranging from Platinum and Goodnews Bay in the Kuskokwim Bay area to Wales and Little Diomed in Bering Strait.

Muriel Morse, Western Alaska outreach coordinator for the AMCC will continue to interview subsistence users in BSEAG villages outside the Kawerak area for the mapping project. The AMCC will convert hand-drawn maps developed in interviews with subsistence users to digital maps using Geographic Information System technology.

The project aims to document and map the human dimensions of the marine environment for use by the North Pacific Fishery Management Council in developing a plan for the Northern Bering Sea Research Area that is responsive to needs of the communities.

The council established the NBSRA at a meeting in June 2007 when it approved Amendment 89 to the Bering Sea Aleutian Islands Groundfish Fisheries Management Plan. During that meeting the council received resolutions from 25 Bering Sea tribal governments calling for protection of subsistence resources and sensitive areas from bottom trawl fishing.

By 2007 scientists conducting research in the northern Bering Sea and subsistence users in the area had reported signs of a major ecosystem shift associated with climate change and loss of sea ice in the Bering Sea.* Some fish species appeared to be shifting northward from the southeastern Bering Sea to subarctic regions. It was anticipated that bottom trawl fisheries would follow the fish populations they target into the northern Bering Sea. The NBSRA became effective in 2008 and is currently closed to bottom trawl fishing.

Kawerak's mapping project

Yakoubian said she plans to work with focus groups in six Bering Strait villages to gather spatial and other information to identify important marine species, their habitat, subsistence use areas and subsistence uses.

She said her information gathering and mapping work will be limited to six villages due to time constraints. The villages selected will be in both northern and southern areas of the region. Each focus group will be composed of five individuals.

"The marine species that will be mapped and the local experts who will participate in the mapping will be chosen by each community's IRA council," Yakoubian added. She hopes to begin the project by the end of September and to complete it by the end of November so that AMCC will have time to digitalize the maps in December.

Members of the BSEAG from the Bering Strait region, in addition to Little Diomed and Wales, are Gambell, Savoonga, White Mountain, Golovin, Elim, Koyuk, Shaktolik, Unalakleet, St. Michael and Stebbins.

A gathering of participating elders in BSEAG in the Bering Strait region is tentatively scheduled for January 2010 in Nome, according to Yakoubian and Dorothy Childers, the AMCC's executive director. The elders will discuss the results of the mapping activities and recommend to tribes how the information should be presented to NPFMC. Childers said a gathering for BSEAG members in the Yukon-Kuskokwim region is planned for November in Bethel.

Existing spatial information about subsistence use of the marine environment in the northern Bering Sea is sparse, and the mapping work Kawerak will do is critical, Childers said. "It's up to the tribes to decide what subsistence information they want to give to the federal fishery managers and what areas they want to recommend be protected," she added.

NBSRA research plan

Amendment 89 created four new Habitat Conservation Areas in which future bottom trawling is prohibited to protect bottom habitat from the adverse effects of fishing. They are the Bering Sea HCA; the Nunivak Island, Etolin Strait and Kuskokwim Bay HCA; the St. Matthew Island HCA; and the St. Lawrence Island HCA. These closed areas include locations that have not been previously fished with bottom trawl gear, nearshore bottom habitat that supports subsistence marine resources and blue king crab habitat. Measures developed for the NBSRA do not affect any of the HCAs.

Amendment 89 includes the council's request that a scientific research plan be developed for the NBSRA to study the effects of bottom trawling on benthic species and habitat. The benthic zone is the seafloor. Scientific research has shown that the rich benthic zone on the shallow continental shelf south of St. Lawrence Island supports populations of Pacific walrus and spectacled eider.

The primary goals of the NBSRA research plan are to investigate the effects of bottom trawling on bottom habitat. Fishery managers have stated their intent is to protect crab, marine mammals, endangered species and the subsistence needs of western Alaska communities. The council tentatively plans to review the draft NBSRA research plan in June 2011.

A draft outline of a research plan for the NBSRA was prepared by the Alaska Fisheries Science Center, National Marine Fisheries Service for comment by the council's Scientific and Statistical Committee at a council meeting in June of this year.

"The objective of the research plan is to evaluate the effects of non-pelagic trawling on the benthic habitat in the NBSRA," the draft outline states. "It does not address the management of the habitat, species, or human activities in this area. As such, the plan consists of four components: (1) bottom trawls surveys; (2) nonpelagic trawl impacts studies; (3) fishery-dependent research; (4) ecological studies."

In relation to ecological studies, the draft outline notes: "Ecological research in the [Northern Bering Sea] has been sparse until recent motivation by climate change issues. Current research activities (e.g. Bering Ecosystem Study (Best)/Bering Sea Integrated Ecosystem Research program (BSIERP)) are principally concentrated in the NBS shelf south of St. Lawrence Island.... The tasks of assembling existing data, identifying data gaps and conducting pertinent research are enormous. It is necessary to coordinate with current research programs, agencies, industry and communities on this effort."

The AFSC recommended that a workshop be held to consult with experts and interested parties on the details of the research components well ahead of the due date of the final NBSRA plan. A community and subsistence workshop on the NBSRA research plan is tentatively scheduled for Feb. 24 or 25, 2009 in Anchorage. Participants will include representatives of the commercial fishing industry, Alaska Native tribes and villages, and subsistence users.

The council extended the schedule for developing the research plan, and asked the NMFS to prioritize expanding its bottom trawl survey into the NBSRA. Finalizing the NBSRA research plan is tentatively scheduled for the October 2011 council meeting.

HOLY MACKEREL—Two fish washed up on the beach at Little Diomed the first week of July that had not been seen at Diomed before. Henry Soolook froze one fish and sent it to the Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game in Nome to have it identified. The fish was identified as an Atka mackerel.

Gay Sheffield, biologist with the Alaska Department of Fish and Game checked with NMFS fish specialists who believe this is the most northern occurrence of Atka mackerel. They can be found in the Pribilofs but are mostly a southern Bering/Aleutian Island fish (and a favored food for Steller sea lions). The previous northernmost occurrence was at 62°N near Cape Navarin, Russia when one was identified during a Russian oceanographic cruise during 2004? 2006?

Bowan-Albert Kenneth Kowchee, P.E.

Bowan-Albert Kenneth Kowchee was born to Jennie and Joseph Kowchee, Sr. in White Mountain, on October 19, 1944. Bowan died in Nome on August 8, 2009.

Bowan was a proud graduate of Mt. Edgecumbe High School; he graduated in 1962 and was salutatorian of his class. One of Bowan's favorite times was attending the alumni reunions held during AFN conventions. He loved sporting his school colors, in particular, showing off his Mt. Edgecumbe High School vest, with his special saunter.

Bowan continued his education at the University of Alaska Fairbanks in electrical and structural engineering during 1963, 64, and 65. Bowan was a Registered Professional Land Surveyor and Civil Engineer in Oregon, Registered Professional Civil Engineer in Alaska, and a member of IBEW 1547.

Bowan was gifted; he held numerous engineering positions and owned his own business providing architectural, civil and structural engineering and surveying services. His talents were many. He designed plywood and lumber manufacturing plants; utility structures for steam, water, sewer and petroleum products; bridges, docks, land development, and did land surveying. Rowan received recognition for his work numerous times, most notably, first place award for the Kuparuk River Bridge from Lincoln Arc Welding Foundation. In 1995 the Anvil Mountain Correctional Center, which Bowan designed, received a commendation for being rated nationally in third place for correctional facilities in design and function; and he also received an aesthetics award for the Knickerbocker Bridge, a utility bridge from the Portland Cement Institute. Bowan shared this accomplishment with both his parents and brother, Fred: the Knickerbocker Bridge in Oregon is 500 feet in length and carries a 45-inch water transmission line and is decked with a pedestrian guardrail for bicycles and pedestrians. He enjoyed telling the story of the humble reaction his mother had regarding his engineering achievement.

One of Bowan's colleagues stated

"One element of Albert made him stand out in the crowd... it was his natural ability to perform complex mathematics in his head. When he did use a calculator or a computer it was simply to verify the answers he developed from thinking the problem through".

Bowan always found time to give to his community: He was a volunteer with the Alaska Native Foundation, helping village organizations complete applications for federal programs; he was responsible for obtaining funding for the "Christmas Basket Program" which helps needy families during the Christmas season; he spent countless hours volunteering at the Veterans of Foreign Wars Local Post 9569 in Nome. He was headman at the grill for steak nights, he bartended when needed and helped with maintenance and clean up.

Bowan had many favorite pastimes: He enjoyed hunting and fishing; taking pictures; playing pool; and tinkering with anything that needed fixing.

When someone would ask Bowan what the P.E. stood for he would answer "Perfect Eskimo".

Bowan was preceded in death by his parents Joseph and Jennie, and brothers Soup, Mike and Pete Kowchee.

Bowan-Albert Kenneth Kowchee, P.E.

Bowan is survived by his brothers Fred and wife Rose and Joe Kowchee, Jr.; and sisters Bunny Larsen, Joleen Fagundes; and son Arron Kowchee; and many nieces, nephews and cousins.

In Loving Memory

Michael Gene Walluk Dec. 19, 1962 to Aug. 27, 2008

If tears could build a stairway, and memories were a lane. I would walk right up to heaven, to bring you home again.

No farewell words were spoken, no time to say good-bye. You were gone before I knew it, and only God knows why.

My heart still aches in sadness, and secret tears still flow. What it meant to lose you, no one will ever know.

You and angels around Gods happy throne. I would have held you closer if I had known.

the villages near the cleanup sites. "It's been a very positive program," Lean said. "It puts employment in the communities that need it most."

Jones said in the hiring process, NSEDC works to bring together a mix of more experienced village members and younger residents. "Within the program, we strive to make sure we hire a broad section of people from the community," he said. "So we have some older folks who have a lot of experience outside with other jobs and we hire a group of younger folks who may be just out of high school or are going to college or trade school."

In addition to providing work for local crews of six to a dozen workers, the project also rents four-wheelers, trailers and sometimes boats in villages to get to the debris and get it out.

Lean said most of the collected debris is taken to landfills. "When we go, we pick up everything," Lean said. Well, almost everything. Lean said abandoned fuel tanks and other hazardous materials are catalogued and left for either their owners or future programs to handle. The NSEDC and MCA programs' primary focus is on marine debris.

While the program is labeled as a beach cleanup, Lean said some of those debris can be found as far as a few miles inland. "Those storms have put things up to 20 feet, 25 feet range," Lean said. "In some cases that's miles back from the beach. There are a lot of damaged and abandoned boats up in the bushes."

Both Lean and Jones said the program has received support from both the communities in which the cleanups have occurred and from the NSEDC board of directors. "Everybody likes it when their front yard gets cleaned," Lean said.

a lot to sit for the next 20 years, adding to the community’s junk. “I’d rather see them go to the dump,” he said. The council approved the amendment and then approved the resolution as amended to award the high bids for a 1979 dump truck ($8,600) and a 1982 Ford Dump Truck ($10,100) to Don Mullikin.

City manager’s report

U.S. Coast Guard personnel removed approximately 1 ton of scrap metal and 20 bags of litter from the middle beach Aug. 16 as a community service project in cooperation the City of Nome, reported Bahnke. She thanked Public Works Director Bill Angus for coordinating the process in her absence.

Colonel Reinhart Koenig, U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, toured the Port of Nome with Bahnke and Mayor Denise Michels Aug. 17 during his first visit to the city.

Harbormaster’s report

“July was absolutely the busiest month the [causeway] has ever experienced regarding vessel traffic,” wrote Harbormaster Joy Baker in a report to Bahnke about operations at the Port of Nome facilities dated Aug. 10. “The monthly calendar logged anywhere from three to seven tugs/barges or ships per day at the docks.... It’s becoming common for the vessels to have to wait for dock space when they arrive. Several tug captains have commented ‘gone are the days when you could just show up in Nome and get to the dock.’”

Baker said the causeway hosted two cruise ships and three research vessels last month. The August schedule is just as busy as July, she added. She said the small boat harbor was filled with cargo, fuel and gravel barges, gold dredges and fishing vessels in July.

Museum design criticized

In a letter to the Nome Historical Foundation members and friends dated Aug. 13, Lloyd Perrigo said he experienced “a growing sense of horror” as he looked at the design for the city’s proposed new museum in a brochure. He said he was unaware that a design had been chosen until recently when he saw the brochure at City Hall.

“...The nondescript modern design is totally out of keeping with the themes of the museum and the park it occupies,” he wrote. “If we are going to house our museum in a new facility, and spend multiple millions to do it, it should be in a building that fits the themes it portrays, and in a style that will still look good and appropriate in 30 to 50 years....”

Instead of a streetscape that would occupy 20 percent of the proposed museum design, Perrigo suggested constructing or remodeling a group of buildings on Front Street to resemble the originals in the next 20 years.

He also suggested building a 2,000-square-foot museum in the style of a rectory or other design in keeping with Old St. Joe’s on Anvil City Square. Attached and behind it could be a structure in the style of a carriage house or dog barn to include some of the spaces in the current design, he said. Perrigo believes it is possible to build a museum for less than $16 million that is smaller than the current design but meets the community’s needs.

Larson said he agrees with Perigee’s comments. “I think the city should focus efforts on working with Kawarak to get one facility rather than two,” he added.

LAGOONS—Nome’s sewer lagoons are seen behind the gates that deny public access to the area. The city is having an independent engineer evaluate a proposal by Alaska Gold Co. to pump its treated wastewater to the lagoons from the Rock Creek Mine site.

Pipeline questions

Sue Steinacher commended the council for deciding to have an independent engineer review the proposal for Alaska Gold Co. to build a pipeline to carry water from behind a tailings dam at the Rock Creek Mine to Nome’s sewage treatment ponds in a letter dated Aug. 13.

“This is particularly important given that it has been explained by the Utility Manager that this will not just be a one-time effort to empty the mis-engineered lake, but will come with a 10-year contract that will allow the pipe and sewage lagoon to be used for water used in future gold processing at the mine,” she wrote.

Steinacher posed 23 questions about the proposed project, including these:

- Is the proposed weekly testing for contaminants in the water running though this pipe adequate?
- The mine was permitted under the designation of a zero-discharge operation. Does this pipeline proposal violate their existing permits? Has the city contacted the different permitting agencies to see if this project fits within the mine’s current permits, or if additional permits are required?
- If contaminants do pass through the line what impact could they have on the bacterial flora and in return, the effectiveness of the city’s sewage lagoons?

- Should mining contaminants be found in the city’s sewage ponds, how will this be mitigated? What are the potential costs to the city if the sewage treatment ponds become contaminated?

- Why doesn’t Alaska Gold just build more injection wells? They were permitted to install up to 15, but I understand they have only installed four.

All council members attended the meeting. Michels was absent.

Andersen drops out of NSEDC board election

Question of what constitutes a "fisherman" leads to candidate bowing out

By Tyler Rhodes

Is Stan Andersen a fisherman? It's a question that was nearly a subject of a Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. special board meeting and one that ultimately drove the Nome Common Council member out of the upcoming NSEDC election.

Andersen, who was one of five candidates running for the Nome representative seat on the NSEDC board of directors, withdrew from the election Sept. 25 after questions were raised about his eligibility. Specifically, Andersen's candidacy was challenged on the requirement in NSEDC's bylaws that board members be "resident fishermen" of their community.

In his letter to NSEDC asking to be withdrawn from the ballot, Andersen said that while he has fished both commercially and for subsistence purposes, he has not done so recently. "Having been born and raised in Nome, I have in my younger years participated [in] both subsistence and commercial fishing," Andersen's letter reads. "It would be a stretch to say that I have in the last 10 years."

Council hears preliminary plans for new state office building

By Laurie McNicholas

City Manager Josie Bahnke provided copies of the conceptual design for a proposed new state office building to be located in an area off East Sixth Avenue west of Stedman Street to members of the Nome Common Council at their meeting on Monday.

Bahnke said she has discussed the preliminary design of a 49,000-square-foot facility with Matt Desalarnos of the Department of Transportation and Public Facilities and Nome Planning Commission Chairperson Irene Anderson. Desalarnos told Bahnke that DOT/PF Commissioner Leo von Scheben will submit the $35 million project in Gov. Sean Parnell's FY 2011 budget.

Councilwoman Mary Knodel recommended asking Acting City Engineer Jim Vogel to determine the cost of extending Stedman Street to the Bypass Road. She said a new state office building will increase traffic in the area. Councilman Jerald Brown agreed with Knodel, noting that the new public safety building and hospital are under construction on the Bypass Road. "Get a price and go for a grant," he urged.

Bahnke said there may be an issue with Alaska Gold Co. and future use of the Dry Creek area. Mayor Denise Michels suggested the council schedule a work session to dis-

Feds seek input on limiting chum salmon bycatch

By Laurie McNicholas

The North Pacific Fishery Management Council recently sent a flyer to the City of Nome inviting input on measures to limit chum salmon bycatch in the Bering Sea pollock fishery. The flyer was presented to members of the Nome Common Council at their meeting on Monday.

In response, Councilwoman Mary Knodel asked that the city send a letter to the NPFMC encouraging them to come to Nome for a hearing on chum salmon bycatch issues. Salmon are caught unintentionally in the Bering Sea pollock trawl fishery, and regulations prevent pollock harvesters from keeping them.

Noting that this year's salmon runs in the Nome subdistrict were among the worst on record, Tim Smith, president of the Nome Fishermen's Association, told the Nome Common Council he hopes the city will take a position on the chum salmon bycatch issue.

"Our fisheries are stressed," Smith said. "Chum are important in this area. There has been no commercial fishing in the Nome subdistrict since 1989." Smith said the Nome subdistrict has had a Tier II subsistence fishery for chum salmon in some years since 1999. A Tier II fishery is the most restrictive subsistence management measure.

"I've been a commercial fisherman since 1979," Eric Osborne told the Nome Common Council. "I was a salmon fisherman for the first 20 years." He said he no longer fishes for salmon because the stocks are depleted. Osborne said the city can have an impact on fishery management by forming an opinion on how to sustain fisheries and presenting it to the NPFMC.

The NPFMC is required by the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act (MSA) to balance minimizing salmon bycatch with allowing full harvest of the pollock total allowable catch.

Despite existing bycatch control measures, chum salmon bycatch soared to a historic high of 704,590 fish in 2005. Bycatch levels have dropped dramatically since that time to about 30,000 to date in 2009. Chum salmon are taken almost entirely in the summer/fall (B) pollock fishery.

New measures the NPFMC is considering to limit chum salmon bycatch include:

- Caps on the amount of chum salmon bycatch allowed in the pollock fisheries that when reached would prevent further harvest of pollock. Limits under consideration range from annual caps of 58,000 to 480,000 chum salmon (overall for the pollock fishery or divided by processing sector with options for transferable bycatch allocations among sectors or components of sectors).

- Closure of areas where high chum salmon bycatch has historically occurred.

The NPFMC will review information in a staff discussion paper to develop alternatives for a future analysis of proposed management measures at its December 2009 meeting in Anchorage. The council's Salmon Bycatch Workgroup will meet Oct. 29 in Anchorage to review the staff discussion paper and make recommendations for the council to consider at its December meeting.

The council's Rural Community Outreach Committee identified the proposed chum salmon bycatch action as an important project for outreach efforts to rural communities. Following the council's December meeting, an outreach plan is likely to be developed that may include regional outreach meetings in rural Alaska to explain the proposed action and receive feedback from rural communities.

Copies of the current range of alternatives for limiting chum salmon bycatch are posted on the council website: www.alaskafisheries.noaa.gov/npfmc/current_issues/bycatch/Chumbycatch709.pdf.

The public may provide input on the proposed action by sending a letter by mail or fax to: North Pacific Fishery Management Council, 605 W. 4th Ave., Suite 306, Anchorage, AK 99501. Fax: (907)271-2817.

The public also may testify at a council meeting when the council discusses this action. The agenda for the December 2009 meeting will be posted in mid-November on the council website: www.alaskafisheries.noaa.gov/npfmc.

Dear Editor,

It's just me again. I guess I just wasn't quite done. Darn it anyway. Sometimes I wish I knew how to shut up, but I guess, it's in my genes. I must be my father's daughter after all. He was a very wonderful man (and my mother too). I'm glad for everything they and their parents taught me. Although I often tend to bring things up out of text, I am just trying to bring up issues I think need to be addressed at some point in time.

Every day I say Quyanna-Buk for all of you. I am most thankful for all my family and my friends. I am glad I got to meet you all. I often think of all of you and wish you'd drop a line or something to say how things are.

I often wonder about our legal system. If the people just keep getting a slap on the wrist for the things they do—they'll just keep doing it.

Another issue we seem to be having is being told which representative might be coming to our village to discuss things that affect us in our region. They can say they might have put up signs or said something on the radio, and maybe they did that day, but I think we have the right to be told at least a week or so before it happens. It is only fair to the people who would like to voice their concerns. It should not only include the members of the different entities. Our opinions are supposed to count too.

After reading my last letter, VPSO Don McKenzie came up to me and told me that if there are enough interested people here who would like to go fire fighting that they could have someone come in and administer the test. So if you are interested you can go down to the police department and register with him. Thank you, Don.

Hi to all my many friends. I hope that everyone has a safe and great fall/winter. Take care, you all.

As always,
Karen Nanouk

Civic Duty

This coming Tuesday we have the opportunity to do our civic duty and vote in Nome's municipal election. It is a right and freedom that our forefathers have paid for in blood and of which many in today's world are deprived.

We even have a few contested seats and the NSEDC election promises to be interesting. It's really like two elections. Every registered voter can vote for the NSEDC slate, but only folks who live inside Nome's city limits can vote in the city election. That's too bad. Nome has many residents who live outside of town. Sounds odd, doesn't it? People who live in subdivisions such as Osborn, Banner Creek, Cripple Creek, Ft. Davis and other places on the road system consider themselves Nomeites. They get their mail here, work here, go to school here and shop here, yet they can't vote here or run for office.

Technically they don't live in Nome but are part of our community. They have no say in how this town is run. It's time to remedy that situation and extend the Nome municipal boundaries to include the residents of Nome's satellite subdivisions and make them voting members of this Gold Rush city. Our first order of business for our newly elected city council should be the expansion of our city limits to take in the Nome and Snake rivers, Rock Creek, Glacier Creek and the road system this side of Cape Nome, Basin Creek and the Penny River. It's time to do it. — N.L.M. —

Dear Editor,

I don't know where to begin this letter, but I'm writing in regards to the recent bailout of Danny Aukon, Jr. who is being charged with Driving While Intoxicated, who took an innocent man's life.

I was at work when I heard on the radio that Mr. Aukon was bailed out for only $2500.00 with a Third Party sight and sound custodian!

I felt angry, upset, and digusted!

Charlie Bergamaschi was an innocent pedestrian who had a right to be on the highway at the time of his death. Mr. Aukon who was intoxicated shouldn't have been behind that wheel driving! To make matters worse, he allegedly tampered with the evidence and told his passengers not to tell anyone? How cold-hearted is that?

Charlie Bergamaschi was a human being like the rest of us and not only that, he was also a father, brother, uncle, grandparent and a friend to many. I don't know why the court system was so lenient on Mr. Aukon.

I know out there where people were charged with Domestic Violence, Assault, Drugs, and Alcohol and sentenced without bail or they were considered "a danger to the community." I'm not saying they shouldn't be punished, but we're talking about a human being's life! Is that what it costs for a human being's life these days? I think this is totally, totally wrong!

He didn't deserve to die the way he did and I'm pretty sure if he knew there was going to be a Drunk Driver on the highway he wouldn't have been where he was at the time.

It could've been anybody behind that wheel that morning, but it was he (Danny) that decided to get into his truck and drive while intoxicated. Sincerely,
Katherine Ozenna

Dear Editor,

I am writing to you as a concerned citizen of my community, and I more than likely speak on behalf of the whole region. I am fed up with the poor services that our rural communities have been getting.

First of all, the housing situation is all a hodgepodge. There are a lot of families with over-filled houses, houses with bad boilers, and more than half of them are not even maintained by our regional housing authority. Elim was supposed to get six houses in the fiscal year of 2003. It was later cut down to four houses, and still the material is sitting in its same location, rotting, and costing each community that contributes their Indian Housing Plan funding to the housing BSRHA. Something has to be done soon because not only Elim is missing out, but your community as well. There has been stimulus funding going to the Housing Authority, and where is the money going? To the administrative costs? Maintenance, no. We as a whole region are hurting for housing, so don't stop fighting for it. Go to the next BSRHA meeting in Nome and let them know your concerns. Write to our legislators. We need something done.

Secondly, if you have cell phone and internet service with GCI, don't you agree with me that for the cost of the service we aren't getting our money's worth? Some kind of routers should be set up to speed up the service. Some of us have ridiculous bills, and really bad service, which is not fair. GCI should have adequate enough money to keep maintaining their services.

Last of all, I would just like to say to all you young kids out there, finish school! Keep going no matter how tough it may seem. Education is the key to success. We need you because you are our future. Take care all, and good luck with the fall hunting season. Sincerely,
Tyler L. Ivanoff

Dear Nancy,
H.L. Mencken said, "Every election is a sort of advance auction sale of stolen goods."

And as we approach democracy's secular altar, the election booth, a moment of meditation is appropriate. Which candidates are Robin Hoods? Who are the Robber Barons? Where is Spartacus?

Who projects a healing vision of the future? Who can stand up to powerful outside interests? Who can treat the power they'll gain as a trust to be shared, rather than a bottle to be hoarded?

Chairman Harrelson's diatribe in the last Nugget left me queasy.

It is quite an accomplishment for Dan Harrelson and Don Stiles to lose a mere 17 million dollars. About $2,000 for every man, woman and child in Norton Sound. A recently published newspaper article documents that under Dan and Don's stewardship NSEDC has fallen from being the most profitable CDQ group to the least. We've fallen badly.

Never let it be said your vote doesn't count. Roughly 170 people voted for Don in the last disputed election. That's about $100,000 per vote. I give Don his share of the credit because his cost saving measure, firing Steve Rieger, losing his investment skills at a critical moment, led to this economic abyss.

Dan's and Don's Siu Corp.'s gift of partial ownership in the crab vessel to the Women's Group is heart-warming.

But the gift's timing, along with the monetary NACTEC donation immediately before a hotly contested election should raise warning flags.

An equal share in the vessel was sold, while the vessel was valued at $250,000 or so, to a witness and partner, in a pending lawsuit against Dan Harrelson in Seattle. Since then, over two years, about $5,500,000 + has been spent on it. Sincerely,
Eric Osborne

2009 Permanent Fund Dividend is $1,305

More Alaskans than ever, 628,499 to be precise, share in the state’s wealth and get a permanent fund dividend of $1,305, announced Governor Sean Parnell last week. Alaskans who applied for direct deposit will see the money on their bank statements starting October 8. Check mailings of the PFD will go out starting October 22.

NOAA forced to rule on status of ice seals

Whether or not ice-dependent seals are going to be listed as an endangered species due to threats they face from a warming climate, is soon to be resolved. A judge on Friday approved a settlement between the federal National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration and the Center for Biological Diversity, saying NOAA has to come up with a ruling on spotted seals by October 15 and for ringed and bearded seals by November 1, 2010. In May 2008 the Center filed a petition to protect ringed, bearded and spotted seals under ESA due to threats from global warming and increasing oil development in their habitat. In September 2008, NOAA found that the three seal species may deserve ESA protection, but it has failed to make a decision on whether the species warrant legal protection within the one-year deadline.

UA Regents approve tuition hike

The University of Alaska Board of Regents met in Juneau last week and approved a tuition hike starting in 2011. A 100-and 200-level course will then cost $154, upper-level classes will cost $187 per credit.

The regents also approved new academic programs including undergraduate certificates in ethnobotany and environmental studies, a graduate certificate in construction management, bachelor degree programs in nutrition and dietetic and a certificate in corrections. The ethnobotany degree will be delivered at Kuskokwim Campus in Bethel. The environmental studies certificate is taught to rural and Native students through the Bristol Bay Campus in Dillingham. The regents also approved building projects, such as a science building on the University of Alaska Anchorage campus, estimated at $2.6 million and a new site for a proposed energy technology building at the University of Alaska Fairbanks campus, estimated to cost $29.6 million.

Polar bear management discussed in Moscow

Alaskan and federal polar bear managers as well as the Alaska Nanuuq Commission, headed by Nomeite Charlie Johnson, are meeting in Moscow to discuss the shared Chukchi polar bear population. This marks the first meeting of a joint American and Russian polar bear commission with the goal to develop a framework how to maintain the long-term sustainability of the Chukchi polar bears.

Senator Murkowski loses fight to limit EPA

Senator Lisa Murkowski’s amendment to limit the Environmental Protection Agency’s power to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from stationary sources died on the Senate floor last week. Democrats voted against Murkowski’s amendment, which was attached to the Interior and Environment Appropriations bill. The amendment would have prohibited the EPA from regulating carbon dioxide from stationary sources for one year. Murkowski’s energy advisor Robert Dillon explained the controversial amendment, saying that Murkowski believes Congress should be given time to consider the best legislative approach to addressing climate change without a gun pointed at its head. Murkowski also said that EPA regulation of stationary sources would result in a train wreck for the economy, something she thinks the nation can’t afford.

ATG denied retirement benefits

Alaska Senators are upset about President Obama’s objecting to consider service in the Alaska Territorial Guard during World War II as “active duty” service. This rejection affects a bill that would have restored retirement benefits to 26 Alaskan Territorial Guard members. Senators Begich and Murkowski have vowed to enlighten other members of the Senate about the vital role the ATG played in World War II. “We are talking about 26 brave, elderly Alaska Natives who served honorably for this country during World War II. I, frankly, find it puzzling how the administration could object to giving these men the recognition they deserve. The federal government deserted these men at the end of the war, and I hope the Congress and my colleagues in the Senate won’t let that happen again,” Begich said.

Bering Strait experienced earthquake

The Alaska Earthquake Information Center registered a moderate earthquake on Friday, September 25 under the Bering Strait. The earthquake had a magnitude of 5.0 and was located at a depth of about 9 miles and 92 miles North-Northwest of Little Diomedede. Authorities did not receive any reports of injuries or damage due to the quake.

Sexual assault, manslaughter cases bound for trials

By Tyler Rhodes

A pair of Nome residents recently indicted in two different matters have both pleaded not guilty and have had their matters set for trials in November.

A trial date of Nov. 17 has been set for both Sylvia Ivanoff, 43, and Danny Wayne Aukon Jr., 49.

A grand jury indicted Ivanoff Sept. 18 on three counts of sexual abuse of a minor, charges stemming from an alleged incident that occurred in Nome in April. Attorney Bob Lewis, representing Ivanoff before Superior Court Judge Ben Esch Sept. 25, entered not guilty pleas on Ivanoff's behalf to all three of the counts.

The first two counts of sexual assault of a minor in the first degree allege Ivanoff engaged in sexual penetration with two 12-year-old children on or about April 5. The third charge, sexual assault in the second degree, alleges a similar act against a 13-year-old.

Lewis also represented Aukon Sept. 25 before Judge Esch, entering not guilty pleas on his behalf as well. Aukon was indicted Sept. 18 on three counts surrounding a hit-and-run death on the Nome-Council Highway just east of Nome. Aukon is charged with one count of manslaughter, a count of first-degree witness tampering and one count of failing to render assistance to an injured person after an accident.

Aukon's charges revolve around the Sept. 6 death of Charles Bergamaschi, 54, who was found deceased in the roadway that morning. The Nome Police Department alleges that Aukon was driving a pickup truck that struck and killed Bergamaschi. The police further allege ing others who were riding with him not to speak about what happened.

• Andersen

The NSEDC bylaws state that "a 'resident fisherman' shall be an individual with documented commercial or subsistence-fishing activity who is a registered voter residing within the state precinct boundaries encompassing the member community, where he/she maintains a mailing address and permanent domicile and is eligible to receive an Alaska Permanent Fund dividend."

The bylaw gives no mention of a timeframe in which documented fishing must occur to qualify as a resident fisherman. Andersen said his fishing experience may have met the criteria, but did so tenuously. "My eligibility would not be following the spirit of the bylaws when first adopted," he wrote.

Louie Green Jr., a frequent observer of the NSEDC board and a former candidate for the Nome seat, wrote the corporation a letter challenging Andersen's candidacy. "It wasn't a personal thing," Green said. "It was about NSEDC following their own rules."

Green is not in this election for the NSEDC seat, but he is on the ballot for a Nome Common Council seat. Andersen is also running to retain his council seat, but is doing so unopposed and not facing Green. Green is challenging current councilman Randy Pomeranz.

In addition to Green, Andersen cited Tim Smith in his withdrawal letter as another source questioning his eligibility. Smith is running for the NSEDC seat.

Green said he felt Andersen did the right thing by withdrawing. "I admire Stan for stepping down, stepping aside to allow it to be a clean election," he said.

NSEDC was prepared to bring the board together Sept. 28 to discuss the issue and determine Andersen's legitimacy as a candidate. NSEDC vice president and chief executive officer Janis Ivanoff said Andersen's withdrawal from the race eliminated the need for the meeting. "We were looking for the most reasonable and fair way to do this with both parties," Ivanoff said, referring to Andersen and Green.

Ivanoff said the issue will still be examined at a later time. "If anything has come out of this, we do see there needs to be some clarification," she said.

Ivanoff added that she was a bit dismayed by Andersen's decision to drop out of the election. "It's too bad," she said. "He's a lifetime citizen of Nome and on the city council. And I think he would have represented the city well should he had been elected."

Andersen said he had decided to run for the board to give voters yet another choice in the race on the Oct. 6 ballot that has drawn more interest than the city and school offices also up for grabs that day. He added that as NSEDC has grown, a person who has experience with large budgets could be of particular use on the board. "Since I've been on the [Nome Common] Council, I've had a hand in over $600 million in budgets," he said.

Still on the ballot for the seat are incumbent Don Stiles and challengers Tim Smith, Robin Thomas and Steve Brock.

Andersen said he felt he had the backing of the NSEDC staff after the question of his eligibility was raised. "NSEDC's staff was real supportive. They felt everybody should have a chance," he said. "They had not run against this fishing thing before."

Andersen suggested that NSEDC offer an at-large seat on its board. "By adding an at-large seat, which would probably come from Nome, you would get somebody else in there with business experience," he said.

As for fishing experience, Andersen said he planned to clear up any future questions over his eligibility to run for the NSEDC board as soon as possible. "Monday, I'm going down to get my subsistence license," he said.

cuss the issue.

City Clerk Sandy Sturgis-Babcock administered the oath of office to Jack Adams, Nome's newest police officer.

Animal control ordinance

During a public hearing on a proposed ordinance to extensively revise the City's animal control ordinances, Animal Control Officer Amy Shithisler asked the council not to approve deletion of the following sentence in Section 10.30.030(b): "The owner of any animal shall not permit the same to frequently or habitually growl, snap at, jump upon or otherwise menace, injure or frighten persons within the city. This provision does not apply to persons who are trespassing or otherwise in violation of the law."

The new ordinance proposed to replace that sentence with this one: "Upon receipt of a written statement identifying dates and time period of frequent or prolonged noise signed by at least two persons residing at different physical addresses in the immediate vicinity of the noise has been received by the enforcement officer, the enforcement officer shall order the owner of the animal to immediately comply with 10.30.03(a)."

Knodel made a motion to amend the proposed ordinance to retain the original language, as Smithhisler requested. Knodel said Smithhisler had won a case involving a nuisance dog using the original Section 10.30030(b). The council approved the amendment.

Mike Quinn asked the council not to adopt a new subsection (10) of Section 10.30.150(a) making it unlawful for any person to dispose of the remains of any fur-bearing animal at any place within city limits except the Nome landfill. Quinn said the City already has an ordinance—he cited Title 15.70 Refuse Service—that prohibits depositing refuse on the property of another. Under 15.70.050 Definitions, "'Refuse' means garbage, rubbish, ashes and similar material discharged from the routine operation of a premises, and susceptible of placement in garbage cans."

Quinn said he prefers that the animal control officer deal with live animals, not dead ones. Brown said there is a bit of a difference between the new ordinance and the one on the books. Knodel said Smithhisler receives calls to pick up dead animals that have been hit by a vehicle and left by the side of the road. Councilmen Randy Pomeranz and Neal Foster recommended leaving the proposed ordinance as it is and then seeking a definition. "We'll get back to you and ask you to participate," Mayor Denise Michels told Quinn. He agreed to participate in discussion of the issue.

The council then adopted an ordinance amending sections of the Nome Code of Ordinances to require parvo immunization of animals, regulate animal noise, prohibit disposing of animal remains within the city limits except at the landfill, and increase certain fees.

Other council actions

The council approved ordinances to amend the City of Nome FY 2009 general fund municipal budget, capital projects fund budget, special revenue fund budget, Port of Nome fund budget and construction capital projects fund budget.

The council approved an ordinance to impose an enhanced 911 surcharge through the local access phone company GTE of $2 per month per local access line and to include each wireless telephone number that is billed to an address in the City of Nome. Previously the council had imposed a monthly surcharge of 75 cents per local access line to fund an enhanced 911 system.

The council adopted resolutions to:

- Award a contract for furnishing 1,500 tons of crushed aggregate for the road surface course to Northcoast Construction Inc. for $36,660. Northcoast Construction submitted the lower of two bids at $24.44 per ton for road surface materials meeting the technical specifications required.

- Authorize the sale of three city-owned surplus vehicles to the public by means of a sealed bid. The vehicles are a 1992 Chevy Blazer, a 1981 Chevy Stake Bed and 1995 Ford Explorer.

The vehicles were part of an advertised surplus bid sale opened publicly on Aug. 18. At that time the 1992 Chevy Blazer and the 1981 Chevy Stake Bed received no bids and the 1995 Ford Explorer received one bid for $9.50, which the council rejected at its meeting Aug. 24. At that meeting Councilman Jon Larson he would rather see the vehicles go to the dump than sell them for nothing and have them sit on a lot for years, adding to the community's junk.

At the council meeting on Monday, staff initially presented a resolution to accept bids no lower than $200 for each vehicle. Foster said a 1995 Ford Explorer is worth more than $200. Bahnke explained that the vehicle needs a new motor. Brown then made a motion to amend the resolution as follows: Bids of less than $1,000 per vehicle will not be considered. Purchasers will have nine months to put the vehicle in serviceable condition or dispose of its remnants. The council approved the amendment and adopted the resolution as amended.

City Manager's report

Bahnke reported that she has met with Bruce Tungwenuk, land manager for Sitnasuak Native Corp., to discuss plans by the U.S. Air Force cleanup of contaminated soils at the Anvil Mountain White Alice site. Tungwenuk told Bahnke that the SNC board approved the destruction of the White Alice antennas at a meeting in July. Bahnke said she informed Tungwenuk of the city's support for historical preservation of the antennas.

Originally the city worked with the Air Force on cleanup efforts at the site, but due to changes in federal law, SNC now has decision-making authority over the future use of the site, Bahnke said. The Air Force will provide an update on the cleanup project and take public comments at a meeting Oct. 28 at Old St. Joe's Hall.

Bahnke said the City will assume operation of the Nome landfill temporarily on Oct. 1. The road crew will haul 2,700 yards of material to the landfill this week and use it for cover. The City temporarily will limit public access to the landfill to Saturdays from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

In answer to a question from Pomeranz, Bahnke said the City will advertise for bids for operation of the landfill as soon as the work is finished. Public Works Director Bill Angus said the project will be finished in one week.

Bahnke said the skate part is open for public use.

A welcoming reception for John Papasadora, who will become Chief of Police Oct. 1, and a farewell to Interim Chief Dallas Massie will take place Oct. 8 from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. at Old St. Joe's Hall.

Utility Manager's report

Utility Manager John Handeland said the Nome Joint Utility System board will discuss whether to obtain a loan from Wells Fargo to purchase fuel at a meeting Sept. 29. Foster asked about current fuel prices. Handeland said prices had dropped 26 cents per gallon in the last week. He said NJUS uses $1.80 per gallon for ultra low sulfur fuel as an index and adds 40 cents to that amount. The average price of fuel in NJUS' tanks now is $2.98 per gallon, he added.

Councilmen Stan Andersen and Larson were absent from the meeting.

In their words: School board candidates answer to the Nugget

Editor's note: The Nome Nugget posed four questions to each of the candidates running for the two open seats on the school board. Candidates were asked to answer the following:

1. If funding were of no concern, what would be the highest-priority item (be it related to a program, staffing, materials or facilities) you would fund for the district?

2. If Nome were to again experience a significant drop in enrollment this year, thus facing another cut in state funding, where would you further trim the budget to make ends meet?

3. On the balance, would you say the No Child Left Behind Act (NCLB) has been more a help or a hindrance to Nome Public Schools? Why? What in the act has been the most beneficial and/or detrimental?

4. What is the most positive thing happening within the district?

Seat C (three-year term)

Joel Alowa (challenger)

1. The NPS District Goals state that it will strive to recruit and retain highly qualified staff. I agree and support that highly qualified staff should be the highest priority for school district funding. Without qualified staffing, the current and future educational materials, programs and facilities cannot be utilized effectively and efficiently in the education of our students. But I also believe and support that funding of the school district should always be a concern to the school board, administration and community. As a taxpayer and community member, I would expect the school board to ensure that any spending for staff, material, program or facility should be done in a prudent and conservative manner to ensure that every dollar spent is spent wisely and effectively. In other words, our limited educational funds should get the most bang for our buck.

2. I believe that the highest priority of the school district is the formal education of our children in the classrooms. If state funding is reduced next year, all staffing, materials, programs and facilities outside of that priority should be reviewed by the school board, in collaboration with the school administration and community, to determine whether or not they can be continually funded with school district funds. This would include athletics, after-school programs, use of school facilities for non-school related activities, etc. With difficult times, comes difficult choices. But difficult times also provides new opportunities, as a community, to build partnerships to share limited resources to maintain high-quality educational services within Nome for our children. If state funding is reduced, the school district should determine what staffing, materials, programs, or facilities could be funded or provided with community partnering. The recent donation by Sitsnasuak to JROTC is an example of a community entity supporting a school program.

3. I believe that NCLB has been both a hindrance and a help. It is a hindrance because NCLB created national educational standards without providing the additional funding to school districts to meet those standards. The Nome School District had to utilize local funds to meet national educational standards that the district had little or no involvement in creating. Additionally, NCLB has incorporated standardized testing that does not take into consideration Nome's diverse student population and educational background. I would support any state and federal legislation that would either provide the federal funding to incorporate NCLB or modify the current law to address the above issues. But I also believe that NCLB has been a help in the fact that it has provoked discussion within our nation and community of what we expect in the education of our children. That parents, community members, and organizations must take a more active role and responsibility in our educational systems.

4. I believe the most recent positive thing that has happened within our school district has been the formal partnering of the elementary school with Kawerak Head Start and Nome Preschool to standardize the teaching practices and expectation of preschoolers who are entering kindergarten. This will ensure that kids are grade-ready to meet and exceed educational standards and prevent students from falling behind in their grade level.

Heather Payenna (challenger)

1. If funding were not a problem for our school district, I'd put more of an emphasis on after-school programs. I think it would be beneficial for our kids if we were able to offer more clubs like B.P.A., SkillsUSA, and Spanish Club, not only at the high school level, but also offer more activities for elementary-aged students like Cultural Club. If we were able to offer more variety for more kids, we'd be able to keep more students involved within the school, helping ensure more focus on studies and less time to get in trouble.

2. There is the potential to save the district large amounts of money by exploring electrical and heating alternatives and upgrades. Turning the district towards "greener" methods will save us from budget cuts that we would need to make if we do face another drop in enrollment.

3. The No Child Left Behind act is a big hindrance on the State of Alaska and rural areas, like Nome. Since being implemented, schools and teachers across the board have retuned teaching methods to direct students to pass a standardized test. Schools are tending to be more concerned with the scores and results of each test, since funds may be cut if we don't meet AYP benchmarks.

4. The most positive thing we have going on in the district are our sport and after-school programs, and those dedicated to helping each and every program succeed. As Nanooks and Wolverines, our kids take so much pride in competing and traveling to different schools, knowing that they want to be at their best and prove they're a better competitor than a Whaler or a Warrior, and much more than a Husky. With these programs students form bonds with other kids, not only in our school, but build friendships and maintain relationships with kids from other schools and cities. Building friendships is only one part of the equation; students also rally behind the support of community members, who live and breathe anything that has to do with them, but also create lasting memories of the mentors who take the time to coach, teach, and guide them day in and day out.

Lynette Schmidt (incumbent)

1. A few weeks ago, I voted to earmark a portion of the district's stimulus funding toward developing a long-term plan. This will become our vision of Nome Public Schools well into the next decade. I will work with fellow board members to identify ways to best address the needs of all Nome Public Schools students. As a regular attendee of school board meetings for eight years and a contributing participant in the educational system of Nome Public Schools, I'm familiar with the workings of the district and will continue to work hard for the young people of Nome.

2. The proper response to an economic downturn is in a proactive approach. Our school board will pay attention to community cues that tough times are ahead. Our long-term vision will keep the big picture in focus so that our response is planning, not panic. And then, if the need arises, our vision will guide the school board to develop educational solutions and smart money management decisions using previously identified priorities. (For example, our board recently approved the expenditure of stimulus funds for an energy study, the results of which could help us invest in long-term savings.)

3. If NCLB were a good thing, I doubt that we'd still be debating its merits after seven years of implementation. That being said, NCLB has provided a springboard to discourse about education. That's a good thing. However, the idea that

"educrats" in Washington, D.C., could dictate standards by which schools in Nome should be measured is silly. NCLB relies heavily on test scores to grade a district's success or failure. Standards-based testing measures only what is taught and how much can be synthesized by students. It cannot measure the educational process and the true cognitive gains made by a district's students. One such indicator of our district's success is when we see young people inspired to return as educators.

The number of Alaska districts meeting Adequate Yearly Progress this year declined 6 percent (from 26 to 23 of 54 districts). The standards and rules for AYP change each year with a fluid population of test-takers. Making adequate yearly progress is kind of like trying to shoot a moving target while sitting in the back of a pickup truck driving on a bumpy road. Either stop the target or stop the truck, and don't limit the shooter to just one attempt.

However, if we set aside the numbers and use standards-based testing to refine, improve and tailor a student's learning materials, methodology and environment, students win. If there's any silver lining to NCLB, this would be it.

4. Caring. The people of Nome care about youth. Scholarships, skate parks, sports, mentorships, etc. are all evidence of the sacrifices Nomeites make for our children. Our community and our district staff are investing tremendous energy and resources to enhance young lives and inspire them to become better citizens. We have learned to take lessons from "outside," adapt them to our unique community, then put those ideas to work. That's the Nome way.

I bring a fresh perspective, strong work ethic, experience and dedication to your school board. I would be honored by your vote on Oct. 6.

Seat D (three-year term)

Betsy Brennan (incumbent)

1. I can think of so many high priority items if money were of no concern (hot breakfast programs, more technology in our classrooms, continued funding for certified teachers in the Head Start and the Nome Preschool program, to name a few). But I think the highest priority I would advocate for would be to fully fund Nome Public Schools' staffing. The district had to cut approximately $270,000 from our budget last year due to a drop in student numbers. We still had to heat buildings and pay utility costs no matter how many students we had, so unfortunately some staff positions had to be cut. My idea goes beyond just the positions that were cut last year. This is what I envision as a fully funded Nome Public School staff:

Teachers and aides: Fully staffed teachers would equate to more electives being offered in the high school. Reinstate a business education teacher. I would staff an aide for each grade level. I would advocate reinstating a full-time social worker at the elementary school, and not sharing that position with the junior high. I would reinstate the junior high counselor or social worker position. I would bring back the days when Nome Public Schools had a staff position dedicated solely to Native Programs. Alaskan Native culture and values in our schools are crucial and can be a main ingredient in the recipe for success of our students. This would also enable the district to focus more on partnering with our local Native organizations. Full funding would include a dedicated technology staff to assist instructors in each building. Fully staffed means never having the library and media centers closed, because we only have one staff member for two different libraries. We could staff more special education positions and a full-time special education director to help those students who are most in need. Another Title I instructor would provide all students the opportunity to be successful. Fully staffed is hiring another position to work under the business manager. That position currently runs the food service program, manages the Beltz apartments, transportation (busses) as well as being accountable for managing district funds. A fully funded staff would include a full time Community Schools Coordinator. This would ensure more after school programs for kids and continued community use of our school buildings. Fully staffed includes a staff position dedicated to manage maintenance and facilities and not put those duties solely on the superintendent.

2. One important fact all Nome school board members keep in mind is our mission statement: "To provide a positive learning environment that educates all students for success in life." With that mission statement in mind, I would advocate for two things:

More cooperation with our community partners in Nome and the Bering Strait School District.

I would advocate for the Nome Public School board to approach the city council and request more funding for the current year to bridge the gap. Obviously this idea may not be a popular option for some. But the district has requested the same funding level from the City of Nome for our budget for the past two years. Student numbers fell abruptly during the 2008-2009 school year. As a result, state funding was reduced while many other expenses increased (fuel, electricity, food costs, insurance premiums). The necessary cuts made by the district to balance the FY2010 budget have really tested our staff, yet they still maintain excellence in education. Whether or not Nome citizens have children in school, we, as taxpayers, all have a stake in public education. Money invested in our schools and staff is money well spent in providing a top-notch education for our students. These students will be Nome's future leaders.

One point I would like to make: If there was another drop in enrollment leading to budget problems for Nome Public Schools, the State of Alaska's "Hold Harmless" provision would go into effect for our district as it did last year. This means the district would lose some funding, but not all. We would still be faced with less money to spend.

3. I believe No Child Left Behind has been a help to Nome Public Schools. The goals of the 2002 No Child Left Behind Act mandate are important—to proclaim that every child can learn, to ensure all children make adequate progress toward academic standards, and to prepare all children to contribute to society. However, there are challenges in applying this in rural Alaska communities and in other parts of our country. NCLB requires schools to be accountable, and that has been a good thing for Nome Public Schools. We have a report card to the public so all community members can see our student progress. Standardized testing has been a valuable tool in showing school staff specifically where students' skills are lacking and improvements needed, as well as where their strengths are. But the exclusive reliance on annual standardized tests to measure basic skills can undermine the role of other subjects like humanities and the arts. School districts are constantly challenged to locate financial support to realize the unfunded mandates as set by NCLB. Many districts and children continue to be labeled as failures even though they are making consistent progress. The reliance solely on test scores obscures the importance of the quality of the relationship between the child and teacher. The praiseworthy efforts of teachers can be made invisible. During 2010, NCLB is slated to be reauthorized by Congress. This will be a lengthy process. I am hopeful that positive changes can be made to make it more responsive to the real needs of children.

4. The most positive aspect of our district is our extraordinary staff. Despite our drastic budget reductions last year, many staff members have taken on more duties and have done them well. (They created lemonade when they were handed lemons!) We have dedicated teachers, aides and special education staff who truly care about the success of all our students. We have a fantastic music program. Our administrative staff is highly qualified and professional. We have a top-notch technology staff. Our NPS District Office staff gets the job done with style. We have a counselor and social worker who work wonders with our students. We have wonderful cooks and outstanding secretaries who keep everything running smoothly. We have a business manager who is simply amazing. Our superintendent is new to the job and brings the experience of working in our district for the past seven years and many more years working in rural Alaska. Our maintenance and facility staff keeps our buildings tidy, clean and in good repair. Not an easy task when you have over 300 children and adults using each of the two main campuses every day. We have staff that go above and beyond every single day.

Gloria Karmun (challenger)

1. Student impact funding! We are in the business of educating our children, funding should be allocated to the education of our children, our future. I'd trust administration to allocate funding where the need is highest with guidance, if necessary from the board.

2. Administration, where feasible. Equal cuts across the board where it least impacts students.

3. Federal mandates cannot be ignored; Nome Public Schools must improve where necessary and exceed the standards set. It is the board's responsibility to support administration as they make gains toward meeting or exceeding NCLB mandates.

4. Nome Public Schools has pride from within and support throughout the community; the community supports our great school, along with NPS as a whole, as we all invest in our future, our children!

Pat Johanson (challenger)

1. Unfortunately a lot of local businesses were left "holding the bag," so to speak, with the sudden shutdown of the gold company. A possible way to prevent this in the future would be some sort of a tiered rate contract stretched out over the expected life of the additional fuel brought in to please this one customer.

2. I'm in support of a wind generation system as long as it offsets the cost of power to the average ratepayer in Nome. As far as other alternative energy options like natural

In their words: NSEDC board candidates answer to the Nugget

Editor's note: The Nome Nugget posed three questions to each of the candidates running to serve as Nome's representative on the NSEDC board of directors. The length of responses only allowed the Nugget to print the answers to two questions. For the full transcript of answers, check www.nomenugget.net. Candidates were asked to answer the following:

1. The issue of salmon bycatch in the pollock industry has been one that has pitted subsistence fishermen against industry. Do you feel the recently enacted bycatch cap is sufficient to protect subsistence interests? If not, is there a better solution to provide balance between industry and subsistence needs?

2. NSEDC's wholly owned for-profit subsidiary, Siu Alaska Corp., manages assets worth about $40 million, but the Siu Alaska board will not allow the public to attend its meetings, which are held in Anchorage. If you are elected, will you advocate to open Siu Alaska's meetings to the public and to hold them within the Bering Strait region? Please explain the reason for your answer.

Steve Brock (challenger)

1. The bycatch cap will not protect subsistence interests at all. The cap has no scientific data to use to measure the impact on any particular salmon stock. Do all of the salmon caught by multiple vessels at different times come from the same spawning stream? Statistically improbable. The cap is completely an emotional response to an emotion-driven conflict. Subsistence salmon fisherman versus the multi-billion dollar trawling industry. It is a feel-good activity for both sides and the government agency mandated to oversee the fishing activity. How did they arrive at this arbitrary number? It is a reverse calculation for the trawling industry so that they will not be shut down prior to catching the entire quota. It's based entirely on how many salmon they have caught as bycatch in the past, as a percentage of their total catch. Until empirical data exist to identify through DNA sampling the origin of all of the bycatch, then a scientific solution cannot be obtained.

Even with this data, the term "historical" is very important. The origin of the salmon you caught last year will only tell you where last year's impact was. It does not predict where the salmon you bycatch this year will come from with regard to stream origin.

What the data does allow us to do is eliminate one element or factor affecting a decline in fish populations, say in the Nome subdistrict. If through DNA sampling it is determined that none of the salmon bycatch come from depressed stocks, then a cap is unnecessary. On the other hand, if a large percentage of the bycatch comes from depressed stocks, then even greater fishing restrictions would have to be placed on the trawl fleet.

In 1989 I was involved in a joint data collection project between the Alaska Department of Fish and Game, federal Fish and Wildlife and NOAA. Using a helicopter, we collected salmon tissue samples from streams and tributaries throughout southwest Alaska and the Alaska Peninsula. We collected five types of tissue samples from each fish: liver, muscle, scale, retinal fluid and reproductive. We carried a nitrogen cryogenic tank on the helicopter with us to preserve the samples. Those samples are still sitting in a freezer in Anchorage waiting for someone to spend the money to process and analyze the data. The collection was the least expensive part of this activity.

The point of this example is that the technology has existed for some time to identify down to the smallest stream where the fish originate. The technology is not cheap, but that is not the reason why it has not been pursued. If the data is cataloged and referenced for anyone to review, then some very concrete conclusions could be reached. The trawl industry, in particular, and the Area M commercial fishermen before them do not want to take the chance and find out what this data could reveal.

I am not a purist or a protectionist. I made a living 25 years ago in the Bering Sea catching pollock and selling them to the Japanese. There were times when the bycatch of non-targeted fish would exceed the percentage of targeted fish. I have fished commercially for salmon in areas that were clearly intercept fisheries. Both activities were sanctioned by the government entities entrusted to manage the resource.

If we want to try to have balance between the trawl industry and the needs of subsistence users, we have to invest in good research and science and let the data speak for itself.

2. I believe the sunshine laws of the state should be enforced where applicable. If Siu Alaska is to be operated as a for-profit entity, then much of its activities must be sheltered from the eyes of the competition. This is just good business. This corporation most importantly is wholly owned by NSEDC. As a board member of NSEDC, I will insist that all board members have complete access to the activities of its subsidiaries. We do not need another Enron in our backyard.

As Nome's board member I will immediately advocate for the relocation of the NSEDC and subsidiary headquarters back in to the region.

Tim Smith (challenger)

1. If harvesting needs to be limited to protect salmon stocks, subsistence comes first. That's the law.

That principal was overlooked in the recent decision by the North Pacific Fisheries Management Council to allow 60,000 king salmon per year to be killed and wasted as bycatch. In Norton Sound, subsistence fishing is a major component of our economy which must be protected. When subsistence fish and game meat is not available, high priced, lower quality food has to be bought at the store with cash, and cash can be hard to come by, particularly in the smaller communities. When it comes to a choice between profits for the industrialized commercial trawl industry and protecting subsistence, there is no choice. Subsistence has to come first.

In April, I spent a week in Anchorage at the NPFMC meeting and told the council that our salmon stocks were in trouble and trawl bycatch was a contributing factor. This year, only 49 king salmon made it back to the Pilgrim River. That population is probably no longer viable and neither is the one on the Fish River system. The Alaska Department of Fish and Game defines a distinct stock as one having 400 fish and these stocks no longer meet that threshold. We cannot sit by and watch our salmon runs and the ones our neighbors on the Yukon-Kuskokwim Delta depend upon, fished to extinction just to put more money in the bank or to make our corporate partners richer.

Many good people from western Alaska told the NPFMC that bycatch was too high and it was destroying the subsistence economy. When the council set the bycatch cap at 60,000, I was speechless. I do not believe this decision is consistent with the Alaska Constitution's sustained yield mandates, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act's subsistence provisions or the U.S. treaty with Canada that sets the number of king salmon that must be allowed to return to their spawning grounds on the upper Yukon River.

The decision by the NPFMC did not strike a balance between industry and subsistence; the trawl industry had its way and subsistence salmon users were ignored.

Our needs were considered insignificant when compared to the profits of the multinational pollock trawler companies. NSEDC should have insisted that the council protect subsistence. They didn't because that would have reduced our corporate partners' profits. That needs to change. NSEDC should put the people who depend on fish for their livelihood ahead of the interests of big business syndicates.

Kawerak, Nome Eskimo Community, Bering Sea Fishermen's Association, The Association of Village Council Presidents and the Yukon River Drainage Fisheries Association asked the council for a bycatch cap of 32,000 or lower. These groups may take the matter to court and are lobbying the U.S. Secretaries of Commerce and State to intervene, but barring a favorable court ruling or government intervention, we will probably have to live with the council's decision for many years to come and that could mean poor or no harvests for subsistence salmon fishermen.

I think we should continue our efforts to reduce bycatch in the Bering Sea trawl fisheries and interception at False Pass. This winter the NPFMC will take action to reduce chum salmon bycatch in the trawl fishery. In 2005, pollock trawlers killed and wasted 700,000 chum salmon and this year, False Pass fishermen caught 708,850 as bycatch in their red salmon fishery. Since 1999, Norton Sound has had the only Tier II subsistence fishery in Alaska for chum salmon. That's the most restrictive management possible short of a total closure. This year was the worst chum salmon return in the Nome area ever recorded.

Bycatch and interception will continue to prevent our salmon stocks from increasing even with draconian limits on local fishing. We need to enhance our salmon runs with hatchery production. Alaska has gas and geothermal or solar, maybe in the future, but at this point in time I think wind is our only viable option.

3. Follow your set budget, bid your work under contract and ensure everyone is paying their fair share.

Jim West Jr. (incumbent)

1. Nome has always been dependent on diesel for making electricity. NJUS belongs to the Western Alaska Fuel Group, which consists of several western Alaska communities, and is able to purchase a large volume of diesel at a better rate based on higher volume than if purchasing fuel on its own. Purchase price is based on world market prices. In both 2007 and 2008 NJUS purchased additional fuel for anticipated mine power (with the mine paying additional storage costs). NJUS averages inventory, so costs stayed level despite the market fluctuation over the past couple of years. Today fuel prices are lower than last year, but are again climbing. Purchasing additional fuel this fall at current prices should allow a further reduction in fuel price based on averaging. Economic growth is good for everyone, and development factors into a healthy economy for the community, but opportunities should be approached cautiously to insure ratepayers benefit and are not saddled with any additional burden in the event of an economic downturn.

2. Yes, I do support NJUS' investigation to develop its own wind power system. We all know that Nome has a lot of wind, inconsistent, but there are other factors to be considered—what will it do to the fuel efficiency of our generators as the wind comes and goes? Along with wind power we need to investigate some type of electrical storage, either batteries or fuel cells, to keep from becoming inefficient. With all this comes the question of dollars, who, what, where. So far we have secured $4 million from the State of Alaska for the development of wind power; this is a lot of money but still not enough for the size that is needed, and we have to be dollar-wise and responsible to the ratepayers of Nome. There are alternative energy options—natural gas, geothermal and nuclear out there. We have been successful in securing substantial outside funding (grants) to help in the development and replacement of Nome's utility infrastructure. Continuing to seek out funding opportunities will play a major role in the big picture of what options we can develop and afford. We have to find something to lessen the dependency on diesel. While evaluating and seeking alternatives, we have to continue to be cost effective in the delivery of utility services.

3. Continuing to upgrade old systems with more efficient technology, upgrading power distribution systems to reduce line loss, and further expansion of water-sewer systems through available grant programs are some ways to reduce costs, or keep them reasonable. Nome has not had general utility rate increases in over 10 years. This has been possible by partnering with state and federal agencies to fund infrastructure improvements. Also, by expanding systems we have been able to add to the ratepayer base, spreading the fixed costs over a larger group to keep average costs down. We can and should continue to upgrade our systems, look for alternative energy, and train our people. The employees are a big factor in the equation and they take pride in their work. A little maintenance goes a long way in avoiding larger costs, and the employees do a good job of keeping things running smoothly.

Seat C (three-year term)

1. Nome's fuel order in 2008 anticipated a large amount of electricity usage from the Rock Creek Mine. With its unexpected shutdown, other ratepayers were left to pay off the high-cost fuel over a longer period of time. Are there ways to prevent a similar situation from happening in the future?

We need to get a purchase agreement between the purchaser and NJUS. If they don't meet the usage they say they are going to use, there should be a penalty. The penalty should be high enough so it does not increase the ratepayer's bill.

2. I do support alternative energy. Wind is one that we can take advantage of. We have to understand wind is not free. We have to get housing for battery banks and how wind would affect generator efficiency. I think we should look at natural gas.

3. The biggest way that we can reduce the rates is to find cheaper fuel. We can keep on updating outdated water and sewer. We can do the same with the electrical products. Things are made now that are more efficient. I want to thank you for your support.

In their words: Council candidates answer to the Nugget

Editor's note: The Nome Nugget posed three questions to each of the candidates running for the two open seats on the Nome Common Council. Candidates were asked to answer the following:

1. What do you see as Nome's biggest opportunity on the horizon? How do we capitalize on it?

2. What do you see as the most significant challenge before Nome? How do we confront it?

3. Do you feel the council is doing enough to involve and inform the public of its actions? What measures do you feel work and what else could be done to ensure transparent government and encourage public participation?

Seat C (three-year term)

Louie Green Jr. (challenger)

1. Tourism could be a golden opportunity if we create more infrastructure. The City of Nome needs to get behind creating a five- to 10-year plan to motivate new business. The city may also need to extend this idea out to the villages to create more economic development in the region.

Nome has the most extensive road system in rural Alaska (300 miles) and many pristine rivers. We could be a leader in the sport fishing world if we were to enhance our streams with salmon. We need to look at all opportunities for Nome.

2. The current economic situation. The health and welfare of Nome citizens.

The city streets need to be paved to get the dust level down. People spend money on new vehicles that should last five years somewhat trouble-free, but may get only two to three years out of that vehicle. Our streets are turning back into dirt.

Through economic development of small business here in Nome and the surrounding villages we can confront this problem if we start now.

3. No.
Monthly reports from the mayor

as well as newsletters from the City of Nome. Nome Joint Utility System informs the public through newsletters; it's very effective, everyone checks their mail.

Randy Pomeranz (incumbent)

1. One of the biggest opportunities in Nome's future is the region's mineral resources. The problem with this is the logistics to get these materials out of the region. Right now our port facilities can only handle the smaller vessels to dock. We at the city level need to be pushing to get our port extended out to allow the larger ships to be able to come in to dock. This also would allow the larger cruise ships to visit our city. We are getting interest from the cruise industry as we have seen in the increase of ships for the past couple years.

2. One of the challenges that I see is to keep the city's services at the level we are familiar with. In my nine years on the council determining what should get funded and what shouldn't is always hard. We never want to start reducing funds for any of our departments. A lot of our costs are driven by the cost of fuel in our community. We are in the process of doing energy studies on the city's facilities to try to keep our operating costs as low as possible. We are looking at possible forms of alternative energy to help offset our oil and electricity demands. One of my main personal goals is to try and keep our city taxes low so that it is possible for people to survive and stay living here. I don't feel we should put the burden on the people all the time for our higher costs at the city. We also need to keep our communications open with the school district so that we can work together with their funding needs. Over the past several years that has been very helpful for both administrations.

3. Our meetings are always advertised and open to the public. We could try to advertise more often to advise the public of what is going on. The public needs to want to participate in our meetings. We encourage the public to become involved in our meetings and work sessions. As elected officials we are representing the people that elected us and listen to their concerns. Unfortunately not all city business is exciting and people lose interest in the public process. As an elected official our phone numbers and e-mail addresses are displayed at all the websites and city hall. I would invite people to contact me if they have issues they would like to be taken to the other council members or if I can answer them myself.

Seat D (three-year term)

Stan Andersen (incumbent unopposed)

1. The port. Add another cell. Coast Guard. Developing our natural resources.

2. How do we support private enterprise without taxpayer money. Keeping the city budget down.

3. Not sure what else can be done. Meetings are open, TV, radio, newspaper, very few executive sessions. More work sessions?

34 salmon hatcheries; all south of the Aleutians and the State of Alaska is building two multimillion dollar hatcheries in Anchorage and Fairbanks. About one third of the fish harvested by Alaska commercial salmon fishermen come from these hatcheries. If they need hatcheries in those places in order to preserve fishing opportunity, surely we need one here as well.

Prior to statehood, salmon stocks in Alaska were severely depleted by overfishing and harvests fluctuated between boom and bust cycles. During the 1960s and '70s the state developed a hatchery system that stabilized the oscillations in harvest and increased numbers of fish available for harvesting. Hatchery production has been good for the rest of Alaska. We need to do the same thing here.

Since 2004, with the help of many local people, mostly volunteers, I have operated a hatchery on the Nome River. Fish we produced at the hatchery returned to Hasting Creek in 2006 and again in 2008. We think most of the fish that returned to the Nome River this year were from eggs incubated at the hatchery and this will be confirmed in the laboratory this winter. The Hobson Creek hatchery has proven its value; we have produced hundreds of thousands of salmon fry there and by increasing our production we can help restore salmon harvesting opportunity throughout the Norton Sound region.

Salmon enhancement is one of four program functions used to justify NSEDC's tax-exempt status, and NSEDC has spent millions of dollars on salmon projects; mostly fish counting towers and weirs. As a result, we have increasingly accurate counts of decreasing numbers of fish. I believe NSEDC should get out of the fish counting business and give it back to ADFG whose responsibility it was in the first place. NSEDC should invest our Community Development Quota resources in a serious salmon enhancement program with a proven track record of success.

I believe we should set as our goal, a total return of 200,000 red salmon to the Pilgrim and Sinuk rivers. This will provide for the subsistence needs of local fishermen and allow for a commercial and sport harvest that will enhance our economy. This is something we can and should do to address the impact of bycatch.

2. NSEDC has never fully explained why it created Siu Corp., and it has gotten off to a bad start with its formation cloaked in secrecy. This needs to come to an end. CDQ program funds belong to everyone in the region. There is no justification for moving around millions of dollars behind closed doors.

In forming Siu, NSEDC gave $40 million to a privately owned, for-profit company having no accountability to the public. In the newsletter it recently sent to all boxholders, NSEDC said Siu was formed as a tax strategy; that their tax advisors told them they had to do it in order to protect NSEDC's tax-exempt status but, they have refused to show the tax advisors' recommendations to the public, the local news organizations or even to NSEDC board members. They say these tax advisors told them they should have been paying income tax since 1998 when they bought 50 percent of the Seattle-based factory trawler corporation, Glacier Fish Co., but they didn't start paying taxes until 2006. The same people on the NSEDC board, who admit they totally failed to understand their tax situation 11 years ago, are asking us to take their word for it now, when they tell us all we need to do to avoid paying more income tax is transfer millions of our dollars to a shell corporation: Siu, which they control. I think the owners of the CDQ program deserve an explanation of what is going on.

If NSEDC had focused on developing the regional economy instead of trying to model themselves after the Seattle trawler companies, we would not be in the position we find ourselves in today with unresolved liability for who knows how many millions of back taxes hanging over our heads.

Not dealing with this issue will not make it go away. The corporate income tax rate is 35 to 40 percent; with penalties and interest, that could add up to millions of dollars lost to the region if this latest tax scheme fails. NSEDC's two auditing firms disagree on how much NSEDC owes for back taxes. Altman Rogers, the company hired to replace KPMG midway through the 2007 audit, told NSEDC it doesn't know how much is owed. I believe the only responsible action is to obtain an IRS determination of our income tax liability so that we can pay the taxes we owe and stop running up penalties and interest.

The way Siu is being managed, we cannot even find out how much the board of directors is paying its board members. On page 17 of the 2008 NSEDC annual report is a table showing board expenses. The 15 NSEDC board members spent $666,741 on themselves, including lavish meetings in a Washington casino. Fortunately, the law requires NSEDC board members to tell us how much they pay themselves; we won't be able get that information for the Siu board, and that's just wrong.

The citizens of the 15 Norton Sound communities own our regional CDQ program. The public's business must be done in public and I will push to incorporate appropriate open meetings and open records provisions into the NSEDC bylaws. I believe we should form an independent audit committee to advise the board on financial matters. With millions of dollars at stake, we need full assurance that spending will be for the public benefit and not misused for self-interest. The only way that can be guaranteed is with stringent requirements for openness, transparency and accountability.

All aspects of NSEDC and Siu Corp. business must be made open to the stakeholders. Meetings should be held in the region unless there is a clear reason stated for holding them elsewhere. Accurate and complete minutes should be kept during any meeting where business is conducted and provided to the communities. Books and records should be open to inspection by community members and we should be provided reasonable opportunities to participate in the governance and operations of our regional CDQ corporations.

Because of their responsibility to their owners, publicly owned organizations like NSEDC and Siu Corp. cannot engage in business dealings that require secrecy any more than the City of Nome or a state agency could. If something cannot be done in the open, then it should not be done at all. The public's need to know outweighs any business advantage obtained from secrecy, and the public needs to know about the risks associated with any business ventures NSEDC or Siu Corp. is involved in before they commit to them.

Exemption from corporate income tax is granted to organizations that do things for the public benefit that business corporations would not do. It is not a way to evade taxes or to hide profits. Every year the IRS revokes the tax exemption of nonprofit corporations like NSEDC that violate the tax code, and NSEDC has an obligation to show us how Siu Corp. can legally engage in competitive business activities without risking the loss of NSEDC's tax exempt status.

NSEDC and the other five CDQ groups have hired highly paid lobbyists and are in Washington, D.C., as this is being written asking congress to amend the IRS code to make the commercial fishing businesses they have been operating for years exempt from income tax. If Siu Corp. addresses all of the tax liability issues as we have been told it does, why do we need additional congressional action? We deserve an explanation.

I have been working on CDQ program issues since the program began, and if I am elected to the NSEDC board on Oct. 6, I will continue to work to make the program better serve the needs of all of the people in the region.

Don Stiles (incumbent)

1. I would like to applaud the Nugget for asking this tough question—this certainly is difficult to answer, in part because the program the North Pacific Fishery Management Council (NPFMC) developed is very complex and its effectiveness and success is dependent on a number of variables. I think that it is easy to get caught up in misinformation (certainly some people have found it quite effective to provide inflammatory misinformation to further their own goals, whatever they may be). Part of my response will be to describe the action the council has taken as a means to ensure that the reader understands what I'm basing my thinking on, and not to solely rely on what they've heard on the street.

I think that the bycatch cap itself, 60,000 Chinook, would be too high for subsistence interests but, the associated incentive plans and the performance standard of 47,591 Chinook have set the bar lower than 60,000 fish, especially when considered in the long term. There are four different fishing sectors in the Bering Sea pollock fisheries, and each sector has been allocated a percentage of the Chinook bycatch cap based largely on their historical catch of Chinook salmon in the pollock fishery (a contentious issue of its own). The performance standard set by the council dictates that if any sector exceeds its allocated percentage share of 47,591 Chinook in any three out of seven years, that this sector will have its bycatch cap permanently reduced to a share of 47,591. I think that with the performance standard alone, each sector in the industry will strive to keep their numbers below their share of the 47,591 because they do not have the ability to predict the bycatch rates for future years; the timeframe is any seven years, forward or backward. The incentive plan component of the NPFMC action provides its own potentially important reduction measures. This concept provides financial incentives to the industry to keep bycatch rates low. In years like 2008 and 2009, where Chinook bycatch will both likely fall under 20,000 fish, we still want industry to work at keeping bycatch rates down and not give up trying to avoid salmon because they know they aren't going to hit their allocated percentage share of 47,951. An argument can be made that protecting salmon when bycatch is low is more important if bycatch rates are a sign of abundance (salmon need the most protection when their numbers are at their lowest). These incentive plans, which require approval by National Marine Fisheries Service, should provide incentive to the industry to reduce bycatch under all conditions. Several specific ideas have been discussed, ranging from taxing for every Chinook caught (progressively, such that the tax gets higher the more fish you catch) and using the money to fund hatcheries, research, and/or payments to commercial fishermen to alternatively implementing a program in which every pollock boat participating would effectively be in competition to have the lowest bycatch—those with higher rates would be required to pay money, and those with the lowest would receive a financial award for their bycatch avoidance. These incentive plan measures still work within the 47,591 performance standard measure. If no incentive plan is approved, the entire fleet is capped at 47,591. If there is an incentive plan approved and portions of the fleet do not participate, they receive an allocated percentage share of 28,496 Chinook. Ultimately, the bycatch rates are going to be based on a number of variables, including the overall mixing of pollock and kings, and the effectiveness of incentive programs. We'll see an annual average bycatch number appear over time and that will most likely be somewhere between 20,000 and 40,000 fish. If it is towards the high end, perhaps we still need to increase the effectiveness. The answer is probably different for everyone. The incentive programs were quite complicated and were met with considerable skepticism initially. NSEDC and other groups hired two independent economists to critique the incentive plans and to comment on how they would compare to hard caps. They both agreed that incentive plans would work to reduce bycatch in all levels of Chinook encounter rates. I myself would like to see the average bycatch be under 30,000 kings. The program the council adopted has a very realistic chance of making that happen. In years like these past two with bycatch coming in under 20,000 I'm hopeful—hopeful for our western Alaska king runs and hopeful for our ability to harvest pollock. The balance between the two is critical as anyone living in western Alaska can attest to—we definitely need our salmon but cannot live on salmon alone.

Questions posed to NSEDC candidates:

1. The issue of salmon bycatch in the pollock industry has been one that has pitted subsistence fishermen against industry. Do you feel the recently enacted bycatch cap is sufficient to protect subsistence interests? If not, is there a better solution to provide balance between industry and subsistence needs?

2. NSEDC's wholly owned for-profit subsidiary, Siu Alaska Corp., manages assets worth about $40 million, but the Siu Alaska board will not allow the public to attend its meetings, which are held in Anchorage. If you are elected, will you advocate to open Siu Alaska's meetings to the public and to hold them within the Bering Strait region? Please explain the reason for your answer.

2. Another great question, and one that is useful in allowing me to expand on why we've taken the approach we have. As the question points out, Siu is the for-profit arm of NSEDC. Its meetings are, and have been held in both Anchorage and within the region, and are held in private. It is easy for those who wish to attack the process we use and to say that all the for-profit decisions we make need to be made only after local consultation and input. But that isn't how things are done in the business world. You don't have to look far to see parallels in other businesses even in our region. Alaska Commercial Co. doesn't share information with Carrs/Safeway—that is par for the course for many for-profit corporations. If we allow the Nugget to report on potential business ventures and display plans and details for proposed offers, it would severely hamper our ability to competitively make acquisitions in the fishing industry. The fishing industry isn't any different from other for-profit corporations and competition is very fierce. Confidentiality agreements are commonplace when discussing potential acquisitions. I realize the answer the Nugget would approve of is that the candidate will do everything in their power to have the meetings in open session, in Nome, and to share every bit of information that we have. I can respect that these are generally the wishes of press, and understand the opinion from that point of view. However, I also hope the reader can understand where the policy that the Siu board has taken with respect to its meetings comes from and why the normal course of business policy is warranted. I'd like to remind the reader that NSEDC itself does continue to hold open session meetings (unlike any of the other five CDQ groups), even though it isn't required to, and that as a wholly-owned subsidiary, Siu's financials roll up into NSEDC's consolidated financials.

In closing, I would like to thank you for this opportunity to share my vision that I feel will have a profound effect on Nome and the region. I feel that if the region is thriving economically, then Nome will also be thriving economically.

Robin Thomas (challenger)

1. I think the bycatch issue is pretty much a cut-and-dried stalemate. NSEDC has managed, once again, to get itself into a conflict of interest. NSEDC supports subsistence values on one hand and commercialization of fisheries on the other.

I think CDQ groups were originally intended to exploit Bering Sea profits and "send home the bacon" as CDQ dollars to try and improve the quality of life of Norton Sound residents through fisheries programs. Unfortunately, Norton Sound was so underdeveloped that not all the communities had commercial fisheries representation so subsistence leaders were included to sit on the board of NSEDC directors. This paradigm remains as status quo, and directors continue to wear three hats: subsistence, commercial fishers and directors; some directors being more devoted to one hat than the other (two).

I feel that certain salmon species are probably at risk of extinction and will need to be replaced by other available marine species for local sustenance. Some commercial fishers are dependant on their fishing jobs to purchase needed equipment to go after subsistence fish and game or berries and greens. This contradiction remains a conundrum as NSEDC provides the means for locals to fish commercially through loans of CDQ funds.

Will the cap work? Maybe (with honest reporting etc. from all sectors), but only time will tell. Other solutions: I see NSEDC making an all-out effort to fill the bycatch void with alternative value-added seafood compensation programs. Commercial fishers can be compensated to harvest existing stocks of cod, pinks or herring or cod (Pacific cod are locally caught CDQ longline halibut bycatch) at a fair market value. This cod, pink salmon or herring can then be value-added into desirable food products (salted, pickled, dried, smoked or canned, to name a few) and distributed in local food banks to subsistence users who have not been able to harvest enough salmon to sustain quality of life

New Savoonga School

By Dr. Virginia Degnan, Director of Program Support, District Office

Put a new school building, an excited/grateful village, and local and Russian dancers together and you have the makings of a wonderful school dedication. On September 1, the Bering Strait School District Board of Education dedicated the new Hogarth Kingeekuk, Sr. Memorial School in Savoonga. Following a lavish potluck, Superintendent Jim Hickerson and members of the Board each offered comments about the importance of education and the need for the new building. BSSD Facilities Director Bob Dickens, building contractor Clayton Arterburn, and architect Terry Hyer spoke about the process of getting funds and the actual construction of the school.

One of the highlights of the evening was entertainment by the Savoonga Eskimo Dancers and the Russian Eskimo Dancers with John Waghiyi narrating and translating. Although the style of dancing was very similar, the beautiful costumes were quite varied. Bering Strait School District is proud to have the new school in Savoonga and looks forward to many years of quality education.

NACTEC Receives a Donation from Siu Alaska Corporation

By Liz Johnson, NACTEC

The Northwestern Alaska Career and Technical Center (NACTEC) staff was elated to attend a donation ceremony with NACTEC’s governing board on Friday, September 18 to accept a monetary donation from Siu Alaska Corporation. In attendance were Bering Strait School District (BSSD) board member Melvin “Dumma” Otton, Nome Public Schools (NPS) board members Betsy Brennan and Lynette Schmidt, Northwest Campus director Lee Haugen, and BSSD Superintendent Jim Hickerson.

After addressing the crowd and expressing appreciation to NACTEC for providing vocational education in the Bering Strait region, Siu Alaska Corporation Chairman Don Stiles presented a check in the amount of $200,000 to NACTEC director Doug Walrath. After acceptance speeches from both BSSD Superintendent Hickerson and the NACTEC director, NACTEC governing board member representing BSSD, Melvin “Dumma” Otton also expressed appreciation recalling when NACTEC was only a vision during discussions at BSSD school board meetings.

Also present were Siu board members Dan Harrelson of White Mountain, Harvey Sookiayak of Shaktoolik, and Siu President John Eckels. Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation (NSEDC) CEO Janis Ivanoff was also in the audience to support its wholly owned subsidiary Siu Alaska Corporation.

NACTEC has been successfully operating since 2003 and funded through various grant sources, including most recently H.B. 61. Alaska state lawmakers approved H.B. 61 this year expanding state tax credits for approved secondary vocational education. Siu Alaska Corporation has contributed $200,000 to the NACTEC program. This is a tax credit benefit for businesses or others that contribute to vocational education through a local school, school district or state-funded vocational program.

The NACTEC program is a joint venture regional vocational training center located in Nome. The goal is to prepare students for the world of work after high school. The continued development and success of NACTEC has been accomplished through cooperation and partnerships with the Bering Strait School District, Nome Public Schools, Northwest Campus/ University of Alaska Fairbanks, Kawerak, Inc., Bering Straits Native Corporation, Norton Sound Health Corporation, the sixteen regional communities of Brevig Mission, Elim, Gambell, Golovin, Koyuk, Little Diomed, Nome, Savoonga, Shaktoolik, Shishmaref, St. Michael, Stebbins, Teller, Unalakleet, Wales and White Mountain, the Nome Common Council, and the Alaska Department of Labor.

Thank you to Siu Alaska Corporation and NSEDC for showing support to NACTEC!

Unalakleet High School Retreat

By Pete Katongan, Student, Unalakleet

This year Frank A. Degnan High School went to Bible Camp to work on teamwork, leadership activities, getting to know each other, and to have fun.

We planned this retreat at the beginning of the week, left on Thursday, and returned on Friday. We traveled up North River to Bible Camp. Each of the advisory groups had a committee to plan this whole retreat. The freshman decided what we ate and who was going to prepare the food, the sophomores had the activities, the juniors planned the scheduling for what we were going to do, and the seniors decided how we were going to get to camp.

Once we got to camp, we participated in leadership activities such as “chocolate river,” where the high schoolers had to work their way across the river from bank to bank in hula-hoops. Without the “marshmallows,” hula hoops floated down river, we had to wait for each student to get onto a marshmallow in order for us to get to the other side. With five hula hoops we had to fit 40 people in each one. All the hoops were crowded and people went on shoulders and backs. The human knot was another leadership game we played. We had to untangle each team with talking and without talking. We also had a scavenger hunt. This is where each team had to go and find items the staff came up with and take pictures of them.

After the evening games such as bucketball and blob tag, we had a bonfire and then went to the cabins and went to bed. The following morning we listened to guest speakers who talked about what you can do with your life. The speakers were Karl Erickson and Heidi Ivanoff.

My favorite part of the retreat was a game called “capture the flag.” At the beginning of the game we started out with some rules and in the middle of the game we made rules up that weren’t mentioned. People were getting frustrated because we forgot about the rules, and in the end people were happy that the game was over.

Countdown to 2010 Census

We’re fast heading into the 2010 Census – which will be done in Alaska from January – March 2010. According to the Constitution (Article I, Section 2), a Census is done every ten years. Here’s why it matters.

Simply stated, Census means money and power.

First, money. Each person counted brings in $2,200 in federal funding to our community each year. That’s $22,000 in ten years. Or put another way, if a family of four is missed, $88,000 is lost. More than 170 federal programs – from Medicaid to highways to schools – distribute funds according to the Census count.

Second, power. The Census count allots seats in the House of Representatives and the electoral college. States and school districts use the Census to draw their boundaries.

So why doesn’t everyone participate? “People don’t realize how much the Census matters,” said Kim Leming, Anchorage Census partnership specialist. “We could build more local schools, fund more children’s health programs, day care programs – if we had a more accurate local count of children,” she added.

Filling out the Census form is easy. “The 2010 Census survey is brief – 10 questions, 10 minutes,” said Deni Luna, Census media specialist. “Your bank or child’s school probably asks more questions. Also, we do NOT ask income or immigration status,” she added.

Information is kept private. The Census does not share information on individuals with anyone, including government officials such as welfare, police or tax officials. “Even the President of the United States cannot get Census information about a particular person,” said Eric Morrison, a Census partnership specialist based in Anchorage. All Census employees take a lifetime oath to keep information confidential – under penalty of $250,000 and/or five years in prison. By law, all information is kept confidential for 72 years.

There’s no “I” in Team

By Stebbins School Staff

What do Chinese Oil companies and Stebbins Students have in common? Analysts say Chinese oil companies have realized it is time to help each other in order to continue to grab distressed overseas assets in major oil firms. Stebbins secondary students practiced these same cooperative learning and conflict resolution strategies during the first days of school.

Monday was devoted to reacquainting everyone with rules and procedures, examining test data and progress reports, and filling out short term objectives on Notices of Graduation. Tuesday was another story.

In an effort to develop business skills, students tackled various problem solving tasks throughout the day. Building the tallest tower out of a set of objects, completing a scavenger hunt race, and constructing an airplane with a teammate using non-dominant hands were some of the activities that promoted problem solving, role specialization, critical thinking, conflict resolution and communication.

Other activities, such as the “Name Game” (in which participants must guess through a process of yes or no questions the name of the person on the paper that is taped on their back) and “The Green Glass Door” encouraged students to look for patterns, form group consensus, and strategize.

A favorite of all was the frozen T-Shirt: teams of students raced to thaw out a frozen t-shirt and be the first group to don the damp clothing. Thumping, tugging, pulling, body heat and sunshine were all strategies students documented.

All activities were developed to encourage camaraderie and promote cooperative learning and discussion in all the content area classes. Some debriefing sessions were held to analyze what was effective strategy, and what hampered teamwork.

Chinese companies that learn the art of working together may win the oil game, but Stebbins students are mastering that art as well.

Paper Airplane Science

By Ken Stenek, Teacher, Shishmaref

Can you really complete standards and have fun doing it? Levels 3 and 4 Science students in Shishmaref are doing just that. Shishmaref students have been flying airplanes as a part of an experimental process to show proficiency on process skill standards.

Students first asked the question “What paper airplane design flies the furthest distance?” They researched different plane designs and wrote a hypothesis. As a class the students wrote a set of procedures to follow and went to the gym and tested their designs.

By measuring the distance their planes flew in meters, they also got a dose of measurement, which was a skill we needed to work on as a group for standardized testing.

After collecting data, students went back to the classroom and found averages for each plane, computed the range, etc. Students then analyzed the data and made conclusions.

For this part of the experiment students worked directly with their teacher to model the process. For the next, students worked on a similar activity where they chose their favorite plane and chose modifications that would allow their plane to fly farther. This time students worked with minimal help from their teacher to show proficiency on the many standards they were working on.

Students had lots of fun and it was great to see them engaged while completing many standards.

Nellie Okpowruk crunches data to find the mean and range for each plane she flew.

Youth Leadership Retreat

By Dorinda Sagoonick, Student, Shaktoolik

Last weekend Emily Jordan took Agnes Etageak, Dorinda Sagoonick, and Heather Jackson to Stebbins for a Youth Leadership Retreat. Michelle Woods and Reynold Okitun from Hooper Bay, and Roger Franklin from Nome, put the whole Youth Leadership Retreat together. This year is their 6th year doing this Leadership.

In Stebbins there were high school students from the Lower Yukon School District and the Bering Strait School District. In the LYSD there were villages from Emmonak, Hooper Bay, and Scammon Bay. In BSSD the villages who went to Stebbins were St. Michael, Unalakleet, Shaktoolik, Koyuk, Elim, Golovin, White Mountain, Diomed, Gambell, Wales, and Stebbins.

During our first night in Stebbins we played a couple of games where we were in different teams with some LYSD and BSSD students and we had to learn their names. Also we played three different games and in those games we had to be leaders, had to learn how to communicate with each other, and work as a team.

The second day we went back into our groups and rotated around. Michelle was talking about bullying, Roger was talking to us about suicide and Reynold was talking about self-esteem. Also with a couple of ladies from from Nome we played a game against other teams. We had to read about suicide on how come some people committed it, where can they go for help, and other things about suicide. The last night after dinner we made a big circle with the LYSD and BSSD students and we had a sharing circle. They asked questions like who we valued in our lives and what was the biggest effect in our lives.

In the Youth Leadership Program we three girls have learned about suicide and bullying. We hope in our school that bullying can stop so others won't get hurt. Also we hope that suicide can stop in our village so families, friends, cousins, and the community won't feel depression.

Note: The article author, Dorinda Sagoonick, was one of about a hundred students who descended on Stebbins during the weekend of September 19th to participate in this retreat. The students were all identified by peers at their sites as natural leaders that other kids would go to for advice and support.

The retreat focused on teaching skills to help these natural leaders become intentional peer leaders at their sites. Among other things, the topics of dealing with bullying and suicide intervention were focal points. Each site sent an adult sponsor who stepped forward to provide guidance for the youth leaders at the retreat and then will continue guidance at their sites. It is hoped that over time, these youth leaders will be able to make a positive impact back at home.

Live from the North River Bridge

By Ann Marie Stone, Teacher, Unalakleet

Why can't more days at school include grilled hot dogs, fishing rods with a silver on the end of the line, and your peers chasing you around like a crazed moose in an ecosystem that has reached its carrying capacity? Unalakleet Middle School loaded into the trucks on a misty, foggy September morning and traveled up to the North River Bridge for an all day, salmon-themed field trip. Students started out the day by playing games on a sand spit that mimicked population patterns and introduced the concept of carrying capacity. Despite a vicious onslaught of gnats, students entertained and informed their peers across the country and across the globe (via a live stream on the internet) with salmon myths they created and performed. Their creativity was rewarded with a break in the weather and the gnats as lunch rolled around.

The afternoon turned brilliant with sun warming the spit and the bridge, the catch of four large salmon, and an engaging ecosystem scavenger hunt. Students unearthed mushrooms, snapped photos of a dead seagull swarming with maggots, and collected lichens and berries—all for the thrill of the hunt! The field trip closed with a stream velocity activity in which students tracked and timed Damon Hargraves floating downstream in a small rubber raft. They brought their data back to the classroom for further calculations. Unalakleet Middle School would like to thank everyone who contributed to the success of their field trip!

Theme Units, Setting the Stage for Learning

By Jim Nelson, Instructional Model Support, District Office

In a standards-based school district such as the BSSD, the thematic unit—a body of study based on a single overarching idea, or theme—is a powerful way to spark excitement, create meaning, and promote the achievement of several or more standards in several or more content areas. In plain words, it is an educational “two-fer,”...or even a three-fer, four-fer or more-fer.”

The early days of the school year are a prime opportunity to “set the stage” for these units, because the weather is fine and the out of doors and local community abound with opportunities to explore and gather data for future study.

In White Mountain, on a gloriously sunny afternoon, the middle school students of teacher Mike Skelton purposefully move through the village, capturing photographic and videographic images of each classmate in front of his or her own home.

According to Skelton, his students will use the captured images throughout the year to write about their lives and to practice various technology skills such as image enhancement, sequencing, and film editing. Each student can attack standards that he or she is in need of completing, because the theme of self and home is an open-ended theme that can lead to numerous language arts activities accessible to students at all levels.

Eight miles out from Unalakleet, at the North River Bridge, the eighth grade classes of Jessica Keller and Ann Stone convene to use the spawning grounds of pink and silver salmon to engage students in the study of ecology, earth science, mathematics, and language arts.

For Keller and Stone, the activities generated by their Salmon Day will include mathematics through calculation of stream flow, and science through further study and discussion about the life cycle of salmon. Additionally, there is the language arts related writing and retelling of salmon myths, and the integration of technology through the implementation of the internet. “Live from the North River Bridge, its Unalakleet School’s Salmon Day!”

One important element that can emerge from thematic units is the collaboration between teachers, parents, the community, and students. In the case of Keller and Stone, their initial collaboration expanded to include Damon Hargraves, BSSD Distance Learning Facilitator. Hargraves facilitated an internet broadcast which was viewable live at sbt.bssd.org. Hargraves also provided a boat and stopwatch, which he used to float down a known distance of stream while calling off the time elapsed as he went. Students recorded the data in ten foot increments as he called from the bank and students later calculated stream flow from the information collected.

Learning and education is vital. It is the great leveler in the playing field of life. Many teachers in the Bering Strait School District are effectively drawing their students into the act of learning by making it relevant to their lives. While doing this, teachers also maximize the need to cover a broad range of levels, standards and content areas by creating thematic units which drive instruction and create motivation to delve deeper and deeper into the theme.

Suzette Carroll, one of BSSD's Instructional Model Support persons, has ten years of experience using the thematic unit approach in the village of Noatak. She brings a wealth of ideas to Bering Strait School District and is an excellent resource for teachers who would like to take the plunge into thematic units for the first time, or refine what they are currently doing. Her email is scarroll@bssd.

Crab Boat to Little Diomede

By Willis Ferenbaugh, Teacher, Diomede

People in rural Alaska know what comes with the territory. Teachers out here quickly learn about the particular circumstances they face, and they learn that even these circumstances may change from day to day. Flexibility is essential in this part of the world.

Getting out to Little Diomede Island has always been a significant task, from boats to ice runways to the weekly helicopter service that has delivered mail for almost 30 years. But passenger service was not available in August, and so the staff of the Diomede School jumped on the crab boat INALIQ in Nome so that the school year could start on time. This trip was unusual and unexpected for both the teachers and the crew of the boat, and we all cozied up for an overnight trip with some weather coming into the Bering Strait area.

Five teachers hunkered down with the captain and two crew members in the comfortable but crowded quarters. Departing just after noon, we watched Nome drift away slowly... extremely slowly, having become accustomed to the whizzing of the helicopter. The adventure of the trip was tempered by waves on the open ocean and the rocking in our heads and stomachs. We took shifts for napping in the four bunks, and it's safe to say that it wasn't the most sound sleep for anyone. It was a long night at sea. But when dawn brightened the night's thick fog, we could see the south side of our little island destination.

Because Diomede doesn't have a large boat dock, this was not the end of our journey. The seas weren't calm enough to attempt a landing, so we sat anchored near the north side of the island until evening. The ocean wasn't settling down, so some of the local men of the village braved the waves in a small skiff to transfer passengers and many boxes to the island. Men, women, and children helped to transfer all of the cargo up the slippery rocks on the shore. And finally, about 30 hours after sailing out of Nome, everything had been transferred to the Diomede School. We were all tired, and there was a lot of sleeping to be done before our preparations could begin to start the school year in less than four days. But we had arrived.

We are looking forward to a great year at the Diomede School. Many thanks to Captain Greg Alexander and crew members Louis and Thomas for keeping the cramped quarters comfy — as much as possible. (Greg should be especially complimented for his fine cooking, though some of us weren't able to fully enjoy a big meal.) And thanks to NSEDC for helping to arrange the trip with BSSD.

In their words: Mayoral candidate answers to the Nugget

Mayor (two-year term) Denise Michels (incumbent unopposed)

Editor's note: The Nome Nugget posed three questions to incumbent mayoral candidate Denise Michels. She was asked to answer the following:

What do you see as Nome's biggest opportunity on the horizon? How do we capitalize on it?

The biggest opportunity on the horizon for the City of Nome is the opening of the Arctic which will result in community and economic development; educational opportunities; research and science activities; and ultimately, inter-modal creation with the port, airport and a western corridor from the Interior. As your mayor, I continue to capitalize and promote Nome, because of our strategic location in the Bering Sea/Norton Sound. As a regional hub we have made strides in getting infrastructure in place, and I will continue to work further to promote Nome's businesses that support those needed services. We continue to engage with the private, public, state and federal government to identify needs, barriers, access resources and, finally, implement the needed changes—all with input from the public. Most importantly we need to continue our work toward building our infrastructure for safety and environmental protection while balancing sustainable development. There continue to be many exciting opportunities for Nome!

What do you see as the most significant challenge before Nome? How do we confront it?

Locally, the biggest challenge is to keep our property and sales tax at the lowest possible rates, while at the same time, providing the best services we can for our citizens.

Other challenges we face are social service issues that include the need for a detox center, senior and veterans services and changing the social norms about alcohol and domestic violence. We also must continue to support education while we all battle the high costs of operation in rural Alaska.

On the state and federal fronts, the biggest challenge I see is that public funding is not easy to access. While this continues to be a challenge, Nome has been very successful over the past several years in accessing funding for much-needed services, such as the public safety building and the port improvement project. As mayor I continue to provide information and documentation needed so lawmakers, agencies and the private sector can make an informed decision to help invest in our community. We also must continue to engage with policy and lawmakers and other agencies to ensure we are consulted with at the local level.

Do you feel the council is doing enough to involve and inform the public of its actions? What measures do you feel work and what else could be done to ensure transparent government and encourage public participation?

The City of Nome follows the Open Meeting Act. The city posts meeting notices, advertises and provides public announcements. The city holds work sessions and public hearings on issues brought before the council and provides opportunities for the public input in the processes. The council meetings are aired on radio and televised for the public. As citizens of this wonderful community, it is our responsibility to stay involved and be engaged in the public process, and provide correct information so the policy makers have all pertinent information when making decisions.

I do feel that the city can provide more information to the public through the Internet; for example the City's website should have a section for the public to e-mail recommendations for improvement. The website should also have a link for conflict resolution for citizens' complaints and grievances, and the steps or procedures to follow the complaint until it is addressed.

I continue to encourage citizens to call in their concerns, write letters and ask questions, and stay involved in the public process.

Thank you for this opportunity. As a proud citizen of Nome, I have been honored to serve as your mayor for the past three terms, and I would appreciate your vote so that we can continue making progress.

Road to Nome may lead along the Yukon

By Diana Haecker

As Department of Transportation officials and their consultants continue to study the best way to connect the Alaska highway system with the Seward Peninsula and the road system around Nome, one of three alternatives is rising to the top. Favored is a route along the Yukon and on to the Seward Peninsula, connecting to the Nome-Council highway, said Department of Transportation Northern Region's chief of planning and support services Gerald Rafson on Monday.

Rafson said that the western access planning study is a $1 million study, partially funded with former governor Frank Murkowski's Roads to Resources program. The objective of the study is to find out if it is feasible and economically viable to build a connection between the Alaska highway system and the road system around Nome.

A DOT briefing paper to the Institute of the North — an Anchorage based think tank, which gave the impetus for studying the possibility of a road to Nome — identified three routes. Route one is the northernmost alternative, which would lead from Dalton to just south of the Ambler mining district and on to Nome. Route two, or the middle road, would lead along the Yukon. Route three, the longest and most expensive road, would begin in Nenana and head south of the Yukon, possibly connect the Donlin mining area along the Kuskokwim with a major traffic artery.

Rafson said that drawbacks for route one, the shortest and least expensive alternative at 440 miles and a price tag of $3.1 billion, include that the route would cross the Koyukuk national wildlife refuge. Rafson said from his experience with a proposed road in the Izembek National wildlife refuge, crossing a federalized area designated for wildlife protection could mean a lot of trouble for a road project in terms of permitting.

Alternative number three, Rafson said would also cross federal lands and it is the longest and most expensive alternative at 620 miles and an estimated cost of $5 billion.

"We are leaning toward route 2, the middle route. It would be of the most service to the villages," Rafson said. Mining interests would benefit from the other two alternatives.

The study is at a reconnaissance level right now, said Rafson, but some thinking went into the possibility to have spur roads built that could connect the Yukon route with either the northern Ambler district or the southern Donlin mining district. "People need to understand that we're going into an analysis of benefits building this road and that we are refining cost estimates — right now we have rough cost estimates from $3 to $5 billion. We think we can reduce these cost estimates. At the same time we have to figure in

Vitamin D: Will it Ward off the Flu?

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Vitamin D may help prevent serious respiratory infections including influenza, tuberculosis, and common viral upper respiratory infections according to research out of Emory University published last month in the journal Endocrine Practice. The systematic review of research published since 1948 serves as an invitation for scientists to evaluate whether vitamin D supplementation can strengthen the immune system against serious viral illnesses like influenza.

Since the 1930s, fish oils have been known to lower the incidence of respiratory infections. In 2004, researchers demonstrated that Vitamin D given daily as cod liver oil reduced the average number of wintertime pediatric visits for respiratory infections in a group of New York City children.

Vitamin D is a steroid hormone produced in the skin after sun exposure. Unless supplemented in the diet, vitamin D levels in the blood drop significantly in the winter months due to reduced exposure to solar radiation. This effect is seen year-round in those who remain exclusively indoors, like some nursing home patients.

Increasingly, scientists from various medical fields suggest that a deficiency of vitamin D explains why the elderly, malnourished, and children are more susceptible to influenza. In 1987, the late British epidemiologist Edgar Hope-Simpson published a radical theory suggesting that influenza does not obey the rules of infectious disease. Rather, the flu seems to respond to what Hope-Simpson called a "seasonal stimulus." He believed this seasonal stimulus was directly related to a lack of solar radiation during the winter months in the northern hemisphere.

Vitamin D levels may be maintained at a healthy level throughout winter months by supplementing the diet. Traditionally, adequate amounts of vitamin D are obtained by eating wild salmon, seal oil, or other marine foods. In this sense, the Norton Sound region is one of the best places in the world to prevent vitamin D deficiency. Over-the-counter vitamin supplements containing at least 2000 units of vitamin D, equivalent to a single serving of wild salmon, may also help maintain steady levels throughout the winter when taken daily.

Though the news out of Emory and other research centers is encouraging, vitamin D is not considered the cure for the common cold nor should supplementing with vitamin D be considered a replacement for other measures recommended by the Centers for Disease Control including vaccination, frequent hand washing, and avoiding public settings when suffering from viral syndrome symptoms. From a public health point of view, however, especially here in the Arctic, vitamin D supplementation should be seen as a daily dose of sunshine even through the long, dark months of winter.

Dear Voters,

This is a letter of recommendation to elect Tim Smith to the NSEDC board. Tim Smith has been involved with Fish & Game biological studies and management since the '70s. He worked with musk ox in the '70s and then had a career as a biologist with Fish & Game in Nome working with fisheries and caribou, moose, bear etc. Smith was the original proponent of Salmon Lake fertilization that resulted in record numbers of red salmon and no-limit seining.

In the last six to eight years Smith and his wife Rita Smith have been managing and working the Hobson Creek hatchery and have hired me to help catch spawners and assist in egg-take. The hatchery has been inactive the last two years due to lack of funding but the last year in operation we counted almost 250,000 fry.

Along with the great things NSEDC does (grants, scholarships, etc.) a member on the NSEDC board has the potential to influence Fish & Game management and to promote fishery enhancement.

I am very concerned over the poor fish runs recently and would like someone on the board who understands the problem and has some good ideas on restoring the fish to a point where the racks are full and you don't have to count the survivors.

We need someone to vote for a minimal king and chum cap in the polluck bycatch fishery in which currently around half a million king and chum are thrown overboard that were headed to Western Alaska. The king crab appears to be thinned out by the way it took a record amount of time to catch the quota this year.

Smith is interested in exploring the potential of other fisheries to keep the fishing fleet going and bring jobs and capital to Western Alaska. A vote for Tim Smith is a vote for abundant fish and game.

Sincerely,
Roger Thompson

Paul Raymond Phenix

Nome resident Paul Raymond Phenix, 59, died August 27 in Anchorage of congestive heart failure.

Paul was born August 21, 1950 in Fall River, Massachusetts to Raymond Phillip Phenix and Doris Gagnon. The family relocated to Burbank, California in 1953. An employment opportunity as aviation mechanic for Paul's father made the family embark upon an adventurous journey north to Alaska nine months after the birth of Paul's brother Roger. As one of the many "California 59ers" the Phenix family arrived in Anchorage on March 17, 1959 after enduring a two months journey up the frozen Alcan.

Paul graduated from Dimond High School, Anchorage in 1968. He joined the Army the same year and received his first training in avionic mechanics. He served his country in Vietnam from 1969 to 1970 and was honorably discharged a year later.

Paul counted fish for the Alaska Department of Fish and Game at Kvichik River in Bristol Bay and was a laborer for four years at Shemya AFB in the Aleutian Islands.

In 1979 he bought a 22 foot skiff and moved to Seldovia, working as a technician for Sea Galley Cannery until their closure in 1989. Paul then took on a job with the Aleutian Dragon Fisheries in Chignik for two years before relocating to Anchorage. He attended UAA's Electronics' Technology Program, earning a 4.00 GPA and the distinction of being a Chancellor's scholar.

Paul was hired as an Electronic Technician by the FAA in Nome in 1994 and ever since, has called this community his home. He loved his job and worked continuously for the FAA the past 15 years. During that time Paul obtained certifications and accomplished training courses too numerous to list. Two years ago he achieved the status of Airway Transportation System Specialist.

Paul was a very private man and spent most of his spare time reading, listening to audio books and watching movies and TV. He loved sports and was a devoted fan of the ACES.

The majority of Paul's estate has been donated to the communities of Nome and Teller. Paul's family would like to extend their appreciation to Cathy Chamberlain for all her support during this difficult time and for organizing the volunteer effort to distribute Paul's belongings. Paul's ashes were spread on Anvil Mountain on the evening of September 11. Paul's family wishes to thank everyone who attended the simple ceremony and provided great comfort by sharing memories.

Paul was preceded in death by his parents Doris and Ray Phenix. He is survived by his brother Roger and sister-in-law Anja Phenix of Healy.

Yvonne Mozee

Yvonne Mozee, photographer and writer, was remembered Sept. 26 at a gathering of family and friends at UAS-Sitka.

Along with the sharing of memories was a display of some of Yvonne's photographs, taken over a lifetime filled with travel, interesting work and lasting friendships.

Mozee died Aug. 18 at SEARHC-Mt. Edgecumbe Hospital a few hours after suffering a stroke at the Sitka Pioneers Home, where she had been residing since February. She was 85.

Yvonne Yolande Mozee was born

April 25, 1924, in Anchorage, the daughter of Benjamin B. and Jessie (Harper) Mozee.

When she was 2, Yvonne and her two older sisters, Jeanne and Bonnie, went to live with family friends, Anna and Chet Edgar, on a farm near Portland, Ore.

At age 11 she moved to Nome where her father was the U.S. marshal. She graduated from Nome High School in 1941, and attended Willamette University, Salem, Ore., graduating in 1945.

She treasured her Nome friends, maintained contact with them throughout her life and made a number of trips to Nome to visit them.

After graduation Mozee went to New York City, where she became friends with members of the international peace organization Moral Rearmament. She joined the organization, and traveled widely during her 20 years with MRA, based at different times in New York City and Los Angeles, and also at MRA headquarters at Mackinac Island, Mich.

Mozee began her career as a photographer in 1965, when she joined the editorial staff of PACE, a general circulation magazine founded by MRA.

When word of Mozee's death was spread through the informal network linking her old MRA associates and friends, her editor at PACE, Bob Fleming, now of Kingston, Ontario, recalled her as a woman of "determination, charm (and) originality."

Susan Vilbert Hoar, a writer who worked with her at PACE, recalls Mozee as "highly intelligent and stimulating company, and her sense of humor was sparkling and reliably irreverent.

"Yvonne could have done the interviewing and writing as well as the photography," said Hoar, who now lives in England. "She was very sensitive about people and they opened up to her."

Mozee returned to Alaska in 1969 and joined the staff of the Juneau Empire. In the 1970s she lived for a year in Albuquerque, N.M., where her father and stepmother were living, before returning to Alaska, settling in Anchorage. She worked as a freelance photographer and traveled around the state and abroad, making new friends all the while.

She worked for the Tanana Chiefs Conference in Fairbanks from 1980 until 1982. She moved to Sitka in 1986 to be close to some longtime friends. She worked part-time for the Daily Sitka Sentinel for the next 10 years.

In Sitka Mozee became thoroughly involved in community activities, gaining many new friends. She hosted a show on Public Radio Station KCAW-FM for several years, and enjoyed cultural and music events of all kinds.

Mozee was proud of her heritage on both her mother's and father's sides. Her mother was the older sister of Walter Harper, an Athabascan Native who in 1913 became the first man to reach the summit of Mt. McKinley. Mozee devoted many years to organizing and archiving the papers of her father, Ben Mozee. She donated the papers to the Rasmuson Library at the University of Alaska, Fairbanks.

In addition to the publications she worked for, Mozee's photographs appeared in publications including Alaska Journal, Alaska Woman, Alaska Magazine, a bicentennial history of Alaska, and in exhibits at the Alaska State Museum, the Anchorage Historical and Fine Arts Museum and at the Alaska centennial celebration in Fairbanks. At the time of her death Mozee was working on a book of her photos.

Survivors include a half-brother, Elliott "Bo" Mozee of Albuquerque, N.M.,

Andrew James Goldsberry “Kunayak”
Dec. 8, 1983-Sept. 12, 2009

Andrew was born in Nome on December 8, 1983 to Nancy and Victor Goldsberry. He was named for various Andrews and Jameses in his family, especially his uncles Andrew Kunayak, Sr., and James Kiminock. His Inupiaq name came for his deceased apa John Kunayak.

While it was not easy growing up as the sixth of what would be seven children, Andrew loved his family and grew up accustomed to large extended families. He was a natural athlete who improved his skills by running, working out and playing sports; especially basketball. He played basketball beginning in elementary school and continuing through adulthood until the last couple of years when the physical pain of playing just became too much. He competed at numerous city league tournaments throughout the Seward Peninsula. His pleasant manner, smiles and superb “hoop” skills were familiar in many villages. He also organized, played on and managed basketball teams for the Iditarod Basketball Tournament. He won that tournament three times. In the summers he kept active playing city league softball for as long as he was physically able. He loved to fish and hunt, most recently bird hunting with his brother Ayaqa and his lab Dozer he’d trained to be a good retriever.

Like every teenager, Andrew went through a trial and error period. He hit a couple of rocky patches but was always able to pull through. He obtained his GED, straightened himself out, got his life together and went to work. Andrew was pleasant, polite, and popular. He was always the first to lend a hand to friends and relatives. He was young, hard working, smart, eager to learn and enjoyed his life.

Andrew’s life changed once again for the better with the birth of his son Caden in June of 2004. While it wasn’t easy at times being a young dad and learning how to be a father, Andrew always supported Caden and recently had been more involved in his life. His last week alive he picked up Caden everyday from school and when Caden’s mom picked him up on Friday she got an earfull from Caden! He wanted his dad!

Andrew worked from an early age at various jobs until he got his dream job that was to be his undoing. Dependable, eager to learn, a hard worker, strong and young he went to work on the construction of the new Nome Joint Utilities power plant. He was learning construction from start to, he hoped, finish. He was making enough money to fix up his house (and learning the skills to do it), buy a decent truck and snowmachine, and attend a friend’s wedding in Hawaii, and his brother’s wedding in Wasilla. He’d been a good barber for years. He considered attending formal schooling and opening his own barbershop/beauty salon. Earlier thoughts of formal schooling and becoming a personal trainer resurfaced. The skills he was learning would hopefully lead to other jobs; perhaps he would have a career in a construction trade. He was dependable, sober, with simple tastes, saving money for his and his son’s future. He was on a roll with a bright future ahead of him.

Then disaster struck. A panel weighing about 150 pounds was being placed at the powerhouse. It slipped. Andrew caught it. He tried to continue working, couldn’t, was sent to the hospital where a two year and nine months boondoggle of errors and bureaucratic shuffling began that ended with his death on September 12. After a lay off, the hospital cleared him to return to work. He tried but couldn’t. The pain was too much. Not diagnosed, then misdiagnosed a couple of times he used up his savings traveling to Anchorage to see specialist doctors. He was told he would never work construction again. He was not to lift more than five pounds. He had constant and sometimes as he described it “unimaginable” pain. He received workers’ compensation for a while till it was denied. Lawyers would tell him, if they answered his calls, that he had a good case. But he had no money to hire a lawyer. He then went to work at Subway, always smiling, always in pain. He had one operation on his spinal cord. It helped a bit but not for long. He had muscle tears in his back and shoulder that needed repair. He had nerve damage tending towards numbness on one side and constant to “unimaginable” pain. He had discs that needed to be repaired and vertebrae that needed to be fused. He had spinal cord operations that needed to be done with only a 50/50 chance of improvement that the surgeons did not wish to perform now because of his young age. Arthritis was setting in. The neurosurgeon prescribed a pain treatment regimen that worked. Another doctor would change it and return him to the “unimaginable” pain that at rest could bring tears streaming from his eyes and down his face, and crying himself to sleep at night till 3:30 or 5:30 in the morning and leaving him unable to get out of bed on his days off as he lay exhausted in tears. Then the system of revolving doctors would give him a doctor who would listen to him and look at his, by this time, almost 4 inches tall stack of medical reports, change his medication and he would have a brief respite from the unimaginable pain till he got a new doctor. He spent hours and days on the computer researching his condition, possible medication. He was nervous about his prescriptions, worried about addiction, worried about physical damage, worried about his kidneys, his liver. He only knew he would never be made whole again. He was a tough young man. Pain he could bear— his increasing deteriorating physical condition and the increasingly “unimaginable” pain he couldn’t. He was trying to survive until some surgery, some surgeon, some pharmaceutical could be effective enough for him to have a life and did not appreciate being called an addict by a doctor. He had decided the janitorial at Subway in the evenings was contributing to his problems. He had to quit that and had to have a day or two off in a week so he could recuperate enough to go back to work. His family said they’d help more with his bills, suggested other ways of making a living. He was looking into the possibility of disability through Medicare.

Slightly after midnight and work at Subway on now September 12, he called friends who were showing pictures of a trip to Cape Espenberg he’d been invited on but had been unable to go on because of his work. He went by later, talked, saw someone home, parked his truck, walked back to his friends, chatted, went home about 5:00 a.m. At home he wrote a composed, thoughtful, loving letter to his family. The discordant note was his damning to Hell by name five persons who could have made a difference for him from the time of his injury on, but didn’t. He tried hard. He tried to do things right. The system failed him. He did not fail the system. Then he lay down and went to sleep forever to the realm where there is no pain. The pain in Andrew’s back left him feeling hopeless. He had constant pain. This he could bear.

The increasingly more frequent and more severe “unimaginable” debilitating pain he could not. He went from being the star athlete to watching on the sidelines. A man who could once bench-press 400 pounds was told by doctors to lift no more than five pounds. It seemed every other doctor would listen to him, try to help him. Every other one would treat him as some kind of malingering drug addict. He’d come home from the hospital with tears of frustration as well as pain. His future to him was more of the same, only worse.

Andrew always loved life, he had a smile that could make everything seem better and people instantly feel happy. He loved life so much that once he felt he could no longer live with increasingly unimaginable pain, he couldn’t bear to go on. Among Andrew’s final thoughts were these “Rhonda, tell Caden I love him dearly and he was the best thing that could have happened to both of us,” “Love you son and all my family,” “I love everybody that has taken part in my life,” “Life is too short so live it while you can,” and finally “Love all and everybody.” Andrew Goldsberry left us on September 12, 2009. He is finally free from pain.

Passing before Andrew were his brothers Kevin in 1990 and Kavi in 2007; his grandparents John and Florence Kiminock, Victor and Joanne Goldsberry; aunts, uncles, cousins from both side of his family. He is survived by his beloved son Caden Hanebuth and his mother Rhonda Hanebuth; his brothers LieuDell and wife Carmill Goldsberry, Harry, and Samuel Goldsberry; his sister Lillian Buffas, and his nephews and nieces. He is survived and will be remembered by his friends and relatives from Barrow to Anchorage and beyond and in Chukotka, especially his Diomed Islands and King Island aunts, uncles, and cousins the Kunayaks, Kiminocks, Alvannas, Muktoyuks, Soolooks, Moggs, Ozennas, Angusucs and all in those communities.

Even though he was in constant pain it was Andrew’s manner to be smiling whether to customers at Subway or passers by on the street. Even though he was in pain it was in Andrew’s nature to still help in anyway he could. His son Caden growing up will now only know his dad from stories. His family and friends will miss the stop-bys for a cup of coffee and a chat, and the just-checking-in-on-you. His dog Dozer that waited with him till he was found will miss the walks with and retrieving for his master. Friends and relatives will miss the smiling young man who showed up with his hair clippers and scissors. Friends and relatives will miss the lift to the store, the ride to the airport. He always had a helping hand even when he could no longer do what he once was able to do. All who knew him will miss him. Remember him as that strong, healthy, smiling, young man he was for such a brief period of time. He had grown into a fine, sensible, young man mature beyond his years. His family loved him and is proud of him.

Funeral services for Andrew were held Sunday, September 20, by Pastor Arnold at the Nome Rec Center, “Also please have my funeral at the Rec Center so everyone will attend,” as he requested. The Rec Center was full. Burial was immediately after the service at the Nome Cemetery and he was buried, “I would like to be buried right next to my brother” as he asked. A potluck and Eskimo Dancing by his Diomed Islands and King Island relatives and other relatives and friends followed as requested by a couple of the drummers, his uncles.

money for those spur roads, to connect to those mineral resources,” Rafson explained. He also said that a mining company shouldered the cost to build a road to the Pogo mine. “I would expect that would be a model in the future,” Rafson said.

But before any more thoughts go into accommodating resource developers, the DOT needs more funds to even pursue whatever comes out of the study. Surveys, environmental studies and public involvement are steps in the process to get a major project such as this off the ground. While no official public involvement has been invited – yet – Rafson said he welcomes people’s comments. “I think there is a lot of interest from the villages,” Rafson said. With the high cost of fuel, power and the transportation costs for the basic necessities, a road, railroad connection or even a gas line, could mean welcome energy cost relief. “But there is also reservation how a road would affect their subsistence resources,” Rafson said.

Charles Gilbert Bergamaschi

Charles Gilbert Bergamaschi was born to Mary Laura Bergamaschi and James Bergamaschi in Nome, Alaska on January 11, 1956. He was fondly called "Charlie" by everyone except when he was a child when he was called "Little Gil" after one of the uncles from whom he got his middle name. Nome in the late seventies when he met his partner Betty Attatayuk and together they had three children. He worked for MJW, Inc. and Alaska Cab Garage. He then moved to Anchorage and returned home to Nome in 2007. He continued to work for MJW, Inc.

Charles loved to fish, drive, camp, walk and find small treasures. He loved cats as well. Charles also loved to watch his grandchildren. He would give anyone the shirt off his back and was truly loved by his family and friends.

Asked if the road would be kept open year-round, Rafson said that he was not sure about that part. He has done some cost estimates and it would cost $15 million a year just for routine maintenance. And as for road construction and design, he said the department has learned valuable lessons from the Nome-Council Highway which is not open beyond Farley's camp after October as the deep cuts drift in with snow.

Once the final report comes out by the end of 2009, a potential road to Nome needs to get the state's approval before additional funding is allocated. Then a formal public involvement period would begin. But for now, Rafson said, he welcomes people's thoughts and input.

Nanooks notch a perfect regional race

Nome boys notch a 15 to take regional title as Teddy Payenna, AnnieKate Olson earn individual wins

By Tyler Rhodes

Despite clouds, the finish line in Unalakleet Saturday made up for gray with a sea of nothing but Nanook blue.

Led by Nome's Teddy Payenna, a parade of azure jerseys crossed the tape as runner after runner finished the boys varsity race at the Region I North Cross Country Regional Championships Sept. 26. Packing the top five, the Nanooks scored a perfect 15 to claim the regional title.

Nome also crowned two regional champions with AnnieKate Olson scoring a commanding win in the girls' varsity race in addition to Payenna's victory for the boys. Olson's performance was followed-up by strong finishes by her three teammates in the race, all who placed in the top 15. As a result, all Nome varsity runners will be heading to Palmer this weekend for the state meet.

For the Nanook boys on Saturday, the race came as a perfect storm before the storm. Under clouds—but on a dry course—Nome captain Jeremy Head started strong out of the gate to lead the race early on. Payenna, however, mounted a charge on the beach section of the course and powered to the regional title with a time of 18 minutes, three seconds. Head would find the finish line nearly a minute later in 18:53. Payenna's win comes as a late-season surge has lifted him into Nome's number-one spot for two races in a row. The intra-squad rivalry should serve the duo of Head and Payenna well as they both battle for the podium at the state meet.

After Head, the Nanook parade continued at the finish line with Emerson Conger, Nathan Blandford and Tim Sullivan completing the sweep with third through fifth places. White Mountain's Asa Bergamaschi would slip in the ranks for sixth place before Nome's Tim Schmidt crossed to take seventh place. Nome's seventh and final varsity runner, Jeremiah Johnson, finished just short of the top 10 in 11th as the Nanooks dominated the competition. Even if Nome would not have won the race to earn a trip to state, each boy would have qualified by placing in the top 15.

went to Kotzebue who scored 70.

For the girls, their only route to state would be to each finish in the top 15 since they lacked a fifth runner to qualify as a full team. To add to their challenge, the skies opened as their race began, dumping wet, heavy snowflakes that chilled the runners, dramatically cut visibility and turned the course to mud.

Despite the turn in the weather, the Lady Nanooks persisted to all qualify. If they had been able to add that valuable fifth harrier to their ranks, the team would have given the regional champion Kotzebue Huskies a run for their money.

Olson dominated the girls race, running alone to the tape with a time of 23:41. As she has all season, Kotzebue's Winona Hickerson chased after Olson to take the runner-up honors with a time of 24:03. Olson and Hickerson had more than a minute to congratulate each other before Nome's second runner, Richelle Horner, would cross the line to claim third place in 25:12. Horner led a pack to the finish, which included Nome's Caitlin Tozier, who finished sixth at 25:31. The Lady Nanooks' fourth runner, Billie Cosca, earned her trip to state, slipping into the top 15 in 15th place at 27:02.

In team competition, the Barrow

Whalers took the runner-up honors with 88 points, well behind Kotzebue who scored 43.

In small-school team competition, Buckland edged out White Mountain in the boys race with 54 points. White Mountain scored 60. On the girls' side, Kiana led the way with 60 points, beating runners-up Point Hope.

Not content to only lead the varsity races, Nome coaches Jeff Collins and Erika Eaton took the top spots for men and women, respectively, in the open race. The first young runner in the competition to cross the line was White Mountain's Jesse Ashenfelter, an eighth grader who finished third overall. Nome's Taylor Romenesko finished fifth overall in the open race, while Zach Sullivan crossed the line in seventh. The two Nanooks placed second and third compared to other youth running. Nome's Oliver Hoogendorn crossed the line in 15th overall. Even a couple of Nanook parents got in on the action. Sharon Keeney Olson and David Head braved the weather to finish 20th and 23rd, respectively.

throughout the winter. This trade-off will also generate support for the local commercial fishing fleet from the subsistence community and encourage the age-old tradition of sharing. The value-added process will take CDQ dollars to initiate and coordinate but will also create jobs.

2. As a commercial fisherman who has donated 110 percent to developing commercial fisheries in Norton Sound since the inception of NSEDC in 1992, I feel that the bulk of CDQ royalties were reinvested into the Bering Sea pollock industry and only minimal amounts were invested into local fishery development. Siu has inherited the growth and assets (and tax liabilities) of these CDQ dollar investments. On one hand I am proud of the growth, but I am also sad to see the assets moved into privatization where the local harvesters and community may or may not benefit or control, directly or immediately, Siu activities.

As a fisher I have tolerated many years of growing pains on the production and marketing end of the local fishing economy, which NSEDC has created and also chosen to become the major player. The grounds price for fish deliveries has not increased with energy costs and spikes in the cost of living in Western Alaska. When fishers ask for "more CDQ money" there is much squabbling and eventually, token settlements are issued to the fishers just prior to Christmas; usually chump change, disguised as a benevolent gift for harvesters in a struggling market economy.

Commercial fishers are expected to carry the financial burdens of developing fisheries and markets while millions of CDQ dollars are budgeted for subsidizing large institutions such as Siu, Norton Sound Seafood Products, NIC, Nome Joint Utility System, Alaska Village Electric Cooperative, ADF&G, and NSEDC, and cooperate projects within Norton Sound Health Corp., Kawerak and Sitnasuak. Community outreach, benefits and grants, fisheries enhancement projects like fish counting, ear bone studies and in-stream egg incubation, fuel vendors—all these are subsidized by NSEDC.

Fishers like myself keep tightening our belts and maxing out credit cards, all the while groveling for more fisheries infrastructure and support dollars. Fishers are faced with frequent fish plant management, deckhand and plant processor turnover and also expensive learning curves with each new NSEDC manager or turn in the economy. Fishers are faced with bare bones marketing schemes and high costs of operations, yet rarely get any handouts and are expected to become "self-sufficient" as if by some economic miracle. I feel fishers concerns have been put on the side burner while the non-profit NSEDC has grown so large that it has had to split up its assets for tax purposes.

Should Siu operations be open to public scrutiny? As a Norton Sound CDQ businessman/fisherman, I do not appreciate having my livelihood controlled by a popular vote of the community; however, this is exactly why I am running for a seat on the NSEDC board of directors for Nome. This popular voting option was decided by another vote of the community after a lawsuit was enforced, asking for some sort of legal election process for NSEDC community directors. The NSEDC mission statement no longer says "supports local fisheries development;" it now says "will support local economic development through aggressively investing in fisheries in the Bering Sea." Now Siu wants to be (is) privatized. I am sure many local fishers would also like to be privatized and regain control of CDQ dollars, which were originally intended for the development of local fishers, developments that in turn could be instrumental in enhancing the quality of life and economy within Norton Sound.

Coast Guard eyes Arctic operations

Nome likely to see more of the Coast Guard, just how is uncertain

By Tyler Rhodes

Coast Guard brass visiting Nome late last week signaled that while the city will likely continue to see an increased presence, it will not play permanent host to one of its larger boats any time soon.

"To be frank, I don't think you'll see us stationing one of our existing cutters up here," Vice Adm. Jody Breckenridge told a small audience gathered at Nome City Hall Oct. 16. Breckenridge, the new Coast Guard Pacific Area Commander, was passing through Nome on a short visit along with Rear Adm. Chris Colvin, the Coast Guard's 17th District Commander.

The admirals participated in a brief Friday morning meeting with Nome Mayor Denise Michels, City Manager Josie Bahnke, Port Director Joy Baker and Fire Chief Matt Johnson. The discussion ranged from a quick summary of the Coast Guard's Arctic Crossroads operation primarily based out of Nome this summer to its future needs in the Arctic and what role

Tight timeline to fill Foster's seat

By Tyler Rhodes

As Democratic leaders in the region mourn the loss of Rep. Richard Foster who died Oct. 13 of a heart attack, they also have work ahead of them to find a replacement for his legislative seat.

To fill the seat, the party leaders are now accepting applications from candidates in the district through Oct. 26. The district encompasses the Norton Sound region from Wales at its northwest point, and running south to include all the coastal villages through Hooper Bay, ending at Hazen Bay. The district also includes St. Lawrence and Little Diomed islands.

To apply for the seat, a nominee must have been a registered voter in House District 39 since June 1, 2007, and have been a registered Democrat in the district since June 1, 2008. Applications are due at 5 p.m. Oct. 26. A list of candidates is to be published on Oct. 27 on the Alaska Democratic Party's website and candidate interviews are to be held in Nome Oct. 28.

The state Democratic Party calls for the interview committee to be made up of at least five members, including the district chair, vice chair, secretary, treasurer, central committee man and woman, and precinct chairs. Following the interviews, the public will be given a chance to comment on the candidates. District Chair

NovaGold reports third-quarter loss

By Tyler Rhodes

Rock Creek Mine owner NovaGold Resources reported an $18.1 million (Canadian) loss for the third quarter ending Aug. 31.

The loss compares to earnings of $1.6 million (all dollar amounts reported are Canadian, unless otherwise indicated) reported for the same time period in 2008. The Canadian mining firm attributes the difference in fortunes between the two corresponding periods to a number of factors, including the disposal of investments in 2008 that brought in $33.5 million and the increased costs of maintaining the infrastructure at two mines that are producing no gold.

NovaGold reports spending $8.6 million this year on what it deems "care and maintenance" at Nome's Rock Creek Mine and the Galore Creek Mine in British Columbia. Last year the firm spent $5.4 million on care and maintenance activities, primarily at Galore Creek. The Rock Creek Mine was shuttered in November 2008.

For its year-to-date status, NovaGold reported a net loss of $51.4 million compared to net earnings of $2.6 million for the same nine-month period in 2008.

The third-quarter report gives no indication of hope for action any time soon at the Rock Creek

Mine. "The company does not currently plan to restart commissioning activities at the Rock Creek mine in the near term," the report states. The report, however, also indicates the firm is still examining a potential restart or sale of part or all of the property—a position NovaGold has held for most of 2009.

The gold mine just northwest of Nome was shuttered just as it was moving toward production last fall. Kinks in the production cycle combined with a shortfall of funds led NovaGold to pull the plug just as winter hit in 2008.

Letters

Dear Editor,

I have lived in Nome since 1993 and the events this morning, a Wednesday, have prompted me to write my first letter to the editor.

My daughter left the house for the bus stop at approximately 8:30 a.m. She returned almost immediately because there were two men on the corner of Spokane and First arguing about a drug deal. “Where’s my weed?” the one was demanding. I recognized the one individual but was unable to identify the dealer driving a 4-wheeler. He was wearing a dark jacket and had on a ball cap with white, red and blue colors. You both know who I am. As soon as you saw an adult approaching you both left. Guaranteed I will be talking with you soon.

Nome is not an inner city ghetto. Our children should be able to walk the streets and not be exposed to illegal behaviors and actions. Many visitors to Nome have told me how fortunate we are to live in such a safe community. Hmmm? Is that really true?

Drug and alcohol abuse is rampant in our small isolated community. So many of us continue to turn our heads and look the other way. Local folks know who are the little dealers and who the major players in this town are. I hear lots of public outcry that law enforcement doesn’t do their job and why don’t they bust the big dealers? All the cops do is arrest the little guys, the nickel and dimers. Guess what, folks? The way the laws are written is to allow us to live in a free society and not a police state. Just saying someone is a drug dealer doesn’t get them charged. Law enforcement needs help from the citizenry.

We all buy into the hypocrisy.” Yeah, I know he sells dope, but he’s a hell of a nice guy.” “He’s never done anything wrong to me personally.”

Now we can all get together and make noise and be indignant and maybe establish patrols for the bus stops or we can walk our talk and help eradicate drug sales in and around our community. The illegal drug sales in Nome are not limited to marijuana and cocaine. We have it all and it’s all being offered to, sold to and used by our children and their friends.

Dear Editor,

Many people in Unalakleet know that there are a few loose dogs in town. Now I had my dog for the last six years and trained him as a house-dog. Therefore I’ve never kept him on a leash. I let him outside two or three times a day for an hour or so. In the morning by himself and in the afternoon and night, I let him tag along with me.

On September 28 he was spotted at Happy Valley that morning. Since he wasn’t home for a day, I went to go look for him but couldn’t find him. Later that afternoon a friend called me and told me that they saw him dead on our dike. I found him maliciously shot and killed afterwards.

I know someone in Unalakleet knows about it and I hope they can come forward and tell me. I doubt that whoever has done it will confess.

This is one of the reasons that I’m

Up a Rocky Creek

Is NovaGold really putting the Rock Creek Mine up for sale? What a bargain! A steal! A fire sale! What a challenge for a serious entrepreneur. Surely Nomeites can have some speculative and spurious takes on the Alaskan version of Let’s Make a Deal.

We could lease it to a hotel. Never mind Paris Hilton; visualize the Rock Creek Hilton. Think of waltzing under the stars in the ball crusher room, fine dining at the gold table, chamber music in the trommel suites and taking a moonlight dip in the cyanide lake. It could be a haven for birders and bathers. Tourists could line up head to toe in winter to view the fantastic dancing aurora borealis and in summer they could pose with a grizzly. Think of the potential.

Then there’s the last hurrah at the Big Hurrah mine site thrown in as a satellite deal. Imagine a chalet and a ski lift with pit slalom events. In summer there could be mud wrestling and a health spa with healing mineral packs. It could be a moneymaker.

The Nome Chamber of Commerce needs to take up the challenge. There’s bound to be some innovative ideas out there. There’s an old saying about when given a bag of lemons, make lemonade. So, Nomeites start squeezing. — N.L.M.—

Denali plane crash kills wolf biologist; burned pilot walks to safety

A Cessna 185 carrying renowned wolf biologist Gordon Haber, 67, crashed inside the Denali National Park last week. Inside the burned plane, searchers found the remains of what they first thought were two people. A day after the plane was discovered, the 35-year old pilot Dan McGregor turned up after he had hiked about 20 miles to safety. He had walked from the crash site to the Parks Road and found two campers at a park campsite. They took him to his home outside the park boundaries. Emergency responders then medivaced him to a Seattle burn center to receive treatment for his burns. McGregor confirmed that the remains inside the plane are those of Haber. Haber has researched Denali wolves as an independent scientist since 1966 and was a staunch advocate against the state’s predator control program. The National Transportation Safety Board is investigating the circumstances leading to the plane crash.

Governor wants to beef up VPSO program

During a visit to Bethel and attending the 45th annual convention of the Association of Village Council Presidents, Governor Sean Parnell advocated for a greater partnership between the state and communities to increase training, recruiting and retention in the Village Public Safety Officer program. Across the state, there are 71 funded VPSO positions, but only 52 are filled. Parnell said he’d like to see a greater and more meaningful law enforcement presence in the villages and asked the village council presidents to help identify solid prospects for these law enforcement positions. Parnell also spoke on fisheries and energy issues.

In a letter to Commerce Secretary Gary Locke, Parnell requested the declaration of a fishery disaster because of the dismal escapement numbers of king salmon in the Yukon River. Parnell said the state should provide better in-season assessment, management and more opportunities to harvest other species during times of weak chinook runs. An extension of a special subsistence season for moose hunting is also considered.

Feds OK Shell exploration in Beaufort Sea

The federal Minerals Management Service on Monday announced that it approved Shell’s exploration plan for two oil and gas leases in the Beaufort Sea. The leases are located in Camden Bay, 16 and 23 miles north of Point Thomson.

Shell Offshore, Inc. obtained the rights to the leases during Beaufort Sea oil and gas lease sales in 2005 and 2007. The company proposes to drill two exploration wells during the July to October 2010 open water drilling season. Shell’s plans include a mid-drilling season break in activities and removal of the drillship from the area to accommodate fall subsistence bowhead whaling by the Native Villages of Kaktovik and Nuiqsut.

Prior to any drilling activities taking place, the plan must be consistent with the Alaska Coastal Zone Management Program and Shell must obtain an approved Application for Permit to Drill from the MMS. Shell must also meet the air and water quality rules by the Environmental Protection Agency, and Marine Mammal Protection Act requirements of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and National Marine Fisheries Service.

When proposing to drill more than 12 wells in the area two years ago, villagers opposed Shell’s plans. Before going forward with the exploration, Shell needs to secure federal and state permits. Alaska Senators Lisa Murkowski and Mark Begich welcomed the news. Murkowski said she would continue to work with the Obama administration to ensure that environmentally responsible exploration is also allowed to move forward in the Chukchi Sea, and to secure revenue sharing for Alaska. Begich commented on the announcement even before it was officially made. He said that Alaska has long been America’s energy storehouse and that this development demonstrates Alaska’s role in helping to meet the nation’s energy needs.

Second trip to the bush: Attorney General goes to Barrow

Head of the rural subcabinet, attorney general Dan Sullivan scheduled a second trip to rural Alaska in order to continue public hearings. Accompanying Sullivan are Emil Notti, the commerce commissioner, Joseph Masters, the public safety commissioner and Bill Hogan, the commissioner of health and social services. They are visiting Barrow next Friday. Separate meetings have been scheduled with North Slope Borough Mayor Edward Itta and City of Barrow Mayor Pro Tem Lloyd Leavitt, among other local leaders. The subcabinet has to submit a report to Governor Parnell in December concerning long-term strategies for lowering the cost of living and improving the quality of life in rural Alaska. The subcabinet’s first visit to the bush took them to Unalakleet and Kotzebue.

New study shows Arctic can alter Earth’s climate

University of Fairbanks ecology researchers found that Arctic change could alter Earth’s climate. Ecologists estimate that arctic lands and oceans hold up to 25 percent of the world’s atmospheric carbon dioxide. Climate change could potentially accelerating predicted rates of change when releasing the carbon dioxide. The study will be published in the November edition of Ecological Monographs. In their review paper, David McGuire of the Institute of Arctic Biology and Alaska Cooperative Fish and Wildlife Research and his colleagues show that the Arctic has been a carbon sink since the end of the last Ice Age. Over time, it has

Louie Green Sr. said the work to form the committee was still underway Oct. 20. At that point he said Nome residents Rose Fosdick, Nancy Green, Perry Mendenhal, Lew Tobin and Roy Agloinga were slated to serve.

Green said his attempts to get representatives from the villages were so far unsuccessful with many people in transit for this week's Alaska Federation of Natives conference in Anchorage. "I tried calling quite a few," he said.

According to Kevin Harun, communications director for the Alaska Democratic Party, the interviews are slated to be held in public at 10 a.m. Oct. 28 in the council chambers at Nome City Hall. A public comment period is called for at noon. Harun said if additional time is needed for interviews, they will be held after the public comment period.

Noting that it could prove difficult for village residents to make it to Nome to participate in the process—especially for those in the southern end where it would require a flight to Bethel and Anchorage before hopping on a plane to Nome—Harun said a toll-free number is being set up to allow participation via conference call. That number is 1-800-270-1153 with a pass code of 174265 followed by the # sign.

Of the names so far submitted for the seat, Green said he was only aware of Nome Mayor Denise Michels. Application packets are available online at www.alaskademocrats.org, or in person by contacting Green at (907) 304-1231. Packets can be submitted electronically by e-mail to dwilliams@alaskademocrats.org, or in person to Green.

Once the interviews and public comment period has wrapped up, the committee will meet again to whittle the candidate list down to three names which will be submitted to Gov. Sean Parnell who will choose from the list. The deadline to submit the names is Oct. 29. By law, the governor is required to make an appointment to the seat within 30 days of its vacancy.

According to a cover letter in the application packet, candidates will be selected on the following criteria: "Established commitment to public service and community wellbeing; Demonstrated support for Alaska

Democratic Party ideals and our party platform; Future electability to the position; Ability to communicate well with the voters within the district as well as other legislators and the media; The candidate's expressed vision for the position; and the candidate's articulation of how he/she will be effective as a legislator."

Death an apparent suicide

Police were called to a Nome residence after its occupant was found dead inside Oct. 18.

According to the Nome Police Department, Logan Green-Reader, 25, was the victim of an apparent self-inflicted gunshot wound. Police received the call around 11 a.m. Sunday.

In a statement, Chief John Paspodora said members of his department investigated the incident in consultation with the state medical examiner's office. Green-Reader's remains were transported to the state medical examiner's office for an autopsy. Next of kin have been notified.

"The Nome Police Department extends condolences to Mr. Green-Reader's family," the statement read.

Thanks!

Thank you to the people who voted for me in the NSEDC board election. I will continue to work as I have for the past 17 years to return our CDQ program to Norton Sound where it belongs. These difficult economic times make it even more important that we not overlook this opportunity to grow and diversify our economy by creating jobs and businesses in fisheries related industries.

It is encouraging that 60% of the voters agreed with me and Stan Andersen that Nome residents need better representation on the NSEDC board.

As the rightful owners of NSEDC, I encourage everyone to attend meetings, talk to the board members and let the management know what you expect from your program.

New chief brings a new vision

When John Papasodora fist came to Nome he was impressed with the city's police department.

He also saw some room for improvement, which is part of what compelled him to toss his hat in the ring and ultimately accept the job to become Nome's new police chief.

After being on the job for a few short weeks, Papasodora is still taking inventory of both his department and the needs of the city as he works to put together a game plan of how to administer and move forward the organization.

It was Nome's interim chief, Dallas Massie, who first alerted Papasodora to the job opening. "Dallas recognized that the Nome Police Department was a great opportunity to basically revise and build a department that could far surpass any expectations they had for themselves," Papasodora said.

Both Massie and Papasodora are former Alaska State Troopers. Papasodora grabs the reins from Massie, who served as the department's interim chief since early in 2009. Massie stepped in to the fill the shoes of former chief Paul Burke. Burke left the position in late December 2008 to move closer to his daughter who was seriously injured in an automobile accident near Lake Tahoe in California.

After speaking with Massie, Papasodora came to Nome to see for himself. He liked what he found. "I basically evaluated the opportunity to see if this is something that fit me," he said. "I was impressed with a variety of things. I like the sense of community; that's a big thing for me. ...I like the area. I always wanted to work on the west coast."

While this will be Papasodora's first go-around as a police chief, it won't be his first rodeo. His law enforcement career started nearly 25 years ago and includes several supervisory positions. That career started with the Soldotna Police Department in 1985 after he graduated from the University of Alaska Anchorage where he studied criminal justice and history.

Papasodora is also familiar with a wide swath of the state. He spent the majority of his childhood in Anchorage, graduating from Service High School. After five years with the Soldotna Police Department, he obtained a post with the Troopers, a goal he had harbored ever since graduating college. "It broadened my experience," he said.

While his first Trooper posting was back in Soldotna, the job required him to work in other areas of the Kenai Peninsula. Papasodora later accepted a post in Northway, along the Alaska Highway in the Interior. "I had the opportunity to go out there and work with some really great people," he said. "I spent 2 1/2 years out there. I really have a strong affinity for the Athabaskan people and the way they do things."

As he advanced through the ranks within the Troopers organization, he received posts in Anchorage and Fairbanks. Before taking the job in Nome, Papasodora served at the Captain and Commander of the Alaska Bureau of Investigation, an arm of the Troopers. "I had pretty broad exposure to administration with the Troopers," he said.

Papasodora is determined to make this new twist in his career path a good one. "This is my first stint as a chief. I'm going to do my best to make sure it comes off as a positive for everybody," he said.

Now that he is in Nome and back serving a police force, Papasodora is working to build off the strengths the department already has. "Right now law enforcement in Nome is stable," he said. "We have people who are committed to providing quality law enforcement services. They are committed, and I'm drawing on that commitment."

Currently, Papasodora said the department does a good job with what he called "maintenance" issues, such as those that surround public intoxication and incidents arising at Nome's bars. "The work up to this point has been within the means and resources of this department," he said.

But he wants to see more done. "Let's start looking at drug offenses. Let's look at sexual offenses—not only how to address them, but how to prevent them," he said.

He admits that broadening the department's scope without augmenting the number of officers will be a challenge. "We're still going to have to do all these things we have done before, but we are going to have to develop processes to free up time to handle other issues," he said.

One of Papasodora's first tasks will be to fill the one remaining open position on the force. He said Massie did a good job filling vacancies, leaving him with just one officer to find. "We will be looking at different ways of doing that, externally or internally," he said. "I am assessing what skill sets are present right now to see what kind of person we want to bring in. We've got a lot of tools in the box right now, it's just a question of having all the right tools."

Papasodora said as he works to move the department forward, he plans on reaching out and partnering with other community organizations, such as the hospital, the office of children's services and the district attorney, among others. "We're not carrying the ball forward by ourselves," he said.

While he has a large agenda before him, Papasodora said he plans to go about implementing change at a metered pace. "To bring the Nome Police Department to modern standards is going to be a lot of work. We're making change where change matters and making change for good reason," he said. "We're making change that's going to have some legacy, that's going to leave a foundation in place that's worth building upon."

Landfill operator bids open this week

By Sandra L. Medearis

A drive by the Beam Road Landfill revealed a groomed appearance that would put quite a few Nome residential yards to shame. On top of that, the ravens seemed few and hungry, cheated of organic discard from Nome households.

Or maybe the ravens just don't like petroleum-impacted fill that has been used to cover garbage in almost daily attention from City of Nome's public works personnel. The City took charge of the dumpsite on Oct. 1 after Gary Hart declined to apply for renewal of his contract to wrangle ravens and push garbage.

The City has issued a request for proposals to find a new contractor to manage the site. Pending selection of a new operator, the gates of the landfill will be open only on Saturdays from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. The landfill is at Mile Four on Beam Road.

Meanwhile, City crews have been trucking 2,700 yards of oily dirt to the dump from a tank farm cleanup site near Port Road, according to terms of a disposal agreement with Crowley and Chevron. At the same time, the City has cleaned up financially to the tune of $45 per yard removal fee from Crowley Maritime.

According to documents at City Hall, the state Department of Environmental Conservation last month signed off on the transfer and use of the fill from West Tank Farm for covering an older part of the landfill.

Public works employees have done additional work on the dumpsite. A turn-around area has been enlarged so that a refuse truck can, according to original design for landfill operation, drive along the east fence and around to dump refuse off a drop-off.

City staff was to open bids on Oct. 22 to determine a contractor to run the site beginning Nov. 1 for a term of two years on a month-to-month basis.

The successful contractor must agree to operate the landfill according to state DEC requirements and under all laws and ordinances. The operator must hand over 90 percent of dump fees without deductions to the City with payments on the first and 15th of the month. The new manager must keep a minimum of 1,000 cubic yards of fill on site. All books on user receipts must be open to inspection.

H1N1 Flu vaccine trickles in

By Tyler Rhodes
Little by little, Nome and the Norton Sound region are receiving doses of H1N1 flu vaccine.

The limited supply of vaccine arriving to thwart what was initially known as swine flu is being distributed to Nome and the surrounding villages in proportion with the communities' population, said Norton Sound Health Corp.'s Director of Public Health Nursing. "Right now the shipments are so small, we are challenged to split them in the region," she said.

As of Oct. 14, NSHC had received one small delivery of the vaccine, which was completely comprised of the nasal spray variety. The vaccine is also being distributed in a shot form. Under the circumstances with which the health corporation received the vaccine, the nasal spray can only be distributed to patients between the ages of 2 and 19.

With such a small amount of the vaccine available, NSHC is only offering the initial shipments to children between the ages of 2 and 4 who are completely healthy. Younger children are considered to be among those most at risk of complications from the flu, thus putting them first in line. Kilby said the initial shipment of 60 doses received last week has been split up so that Nome gets roughly a third of the supply and the villages receive anywhere from five doses to a single dose. With demand outpacing supply, Kilby said the names of those children whose parents want them vaccinated are placed in a bag and drawn lottery-style to see who will receive the vaccine in what order.

The need for the children to be healthy before receiving the nasal spray vaccine is dictated by the fact that it carries a weakened live-virus component. While it will not cause the full-blown flu, the vaccine can cause very mild flu-like symptoms, Norton Sound Physician's Assistant John Salmon said. The mild side effects have the potential to further complicate respiratory problems of those who either have pre-existing conditions, like asthma, or are suffering from a cold or other illness.

The upside of the nasal spray, Kilby said, is that it provides a very brisk response in girding the immune system, especially for younger children.

The vaccines are being offered free of charge. Kilby's comments came at an evening town hall meeting to address the H1N1 flu and vaccines, and to answer questions the community may have regarding the flu. The meeting drew one sole attendee, a Nome Nugget reporter. Despite the no-show from the public, Kilby did give an update on the flu and its effect in Nome and the region.

The H1N1 flu has been present in the region since late summer, striking the region's communities in varying degrees. Some villages were hit hard in the late summer with a large number of residents sick. In other communities, like Nome, the effect has been noticed, but it has been muted. "We've had a few upticks of people with classic [flu] symptoms, but that's been going on since September," Salmon said.

Kilby said the fact that the clinic has yet to be overwhelmed in Nome with flu patients is a sign that the prevention campaign centered around hand washing and hygiene lodged since the summer has had a positive effect.

Kilby said more shipments of vaccine are expected soon, noting that it should continue to trickle in week by week. She said the next two shipments are planned to be used first for pregnant women, followed by health care workers. Like young children, pregnant women are also included in the higher-risk group for developing complications from the flu.

When health care providers are sick, it can make the flu even more difficult for those they treat. Kilby said the effect of a sick health aide in a village is magnified since there is often little to no back up for providers. "We are seeing signs in the region that [the flu] is causing difficulties in keeping clinics open and keeping enough providers," Kilby said. "It is a huge challenge for that village to have their health care providers go down sick."

All adults older than 18 will be receiving the shot version of the vaccine, which does not have the live-virus component. Children can receive either version of the vaccine.

As more doses become available, Kilby said she has the approval of both the Nome and Bering Strait school district superintendents to allow the vaccine to be administered at the region's schools. She said parents should be seeing information sent home from the schools soon. Parental permission will be required for students to get vaccinated. Parents will also select which version of the vaccine their child or children are to receive.

Due to the sporadic arrival of the vaccine, Kilby said she is unable to predict when specific schools and grades will be targeted. "It is going to be supply-dependent," she said. "It's nearly impossible for me to say, 'We're going to immunize this grade level on this day.'"

• Flu

She did note, however, that the plan is to start with the younger grades and progressively offer the vaccine to older students. "The younger you are, the weaker your immune system will be," she said.

Kilby said she is worried that some parents will opt to not have their children immunized against the H1N1 flu based on rumors that have gained traction nationwide she says are false. "It's potentially tragic for parents to be automatically turning down this vaccine," Kilby said.

While there is a faction nationwide that resists vaccinating their children in general, there has been an additional sense of worry surrounding the H1N1 vaccine. Among the concerns is that the vaccine was rushed to production, shortcutting clinical trials. Kilby and Salmon said that is false. "The H1N1 vaccine is made using the exact same process as the seasonal vaccine," Salmon said. A small number of clinical trials were performed on the vaccine to determine the dosage.

Kilby said there also have been questions about the safety of pregnant women getting vaccinated. "Pregnant women are actually at the top of the list for both seasonal and H1N1 [flu] vaccination," she said.

The H1N1 virus appears to be particularly tough on children, young adults and pregnant women. Unlike the seasonal flu, older people seem to display more resistance. "Elders are not as much at risk as the small children for this one," Kilby said.

Seasonal flu vaccine also on its way

In addition to the H1N1 doses bound for Nome, vaccine for the seasonal variety of the flu is also on its way.

Kilby said all the publicity and media attention surrounding the H1N1 virus has spurred more demand for the seasonal flu virus. As of press time, the health corporation's main shipment of the seasonal virus had yet to arrive.

Kilby said the vaccine was expected to arrive in time to be distributed at this year's health fair this Friday. "It is our intent to do an all-region flu shot day," Kilby said. "Any one at all the villages can come to the local clinic or to the health fair in Nome and a seasonal flu shot on Friday, Oct. 23."

If the vaccine does not arrive as planned, Kilby said the flu shot clinics may have to be scheduled at a later time.

While there may be an impression that the seasonal flu vaccine is slow in arriving in the region, Kilby said the shot has traditionally been given in November. "This is as early as we've given it here," she said of the plan to offer the shot Friday.

Kilby said the seasonal flu is not normally seen in the region until December or January, and peaks in March. "In past years it was recommended we not give the shot too early so immunity would not wane," she said.

While the health corporation is not testing current flu cases to determine if they are from the H1N1 virus or not, she said it is assumed that most cases being seen now are due to the new virus.

Specifically created to counter the H1N1 virus, the new vaccine will not protect from the seasonal flu. Those looking to protect themselves from both varieties of flu will need to get both vaccines, Kilby said.

To help inform the public and answer questions regarding the flu, Norton Sound has set up a telephone line that is either manned or closely monitored so that calls can be returned quickly. Kilby said the line is designed to help people who think they may have the flu and want advice on whether they should seek treatment, as well as being available for general questions on the flu. The line can be reached at 1-888-559-3311, extension 4500, from the region's villages or at 443-4500 in Nome.

Richard Foster leaves behind legacy of service, friendship

Neal "Richard" Foster
Aug. 6, 1946 - Oct. 13, 2009

Neal "Richard" Foster died from a heart attack in Puyallup, Wash., Oct. 13. He was born in Nome Aug. 9, 1946 to Neal "Willie" Foster and Jane Nelson Foster. He had an older brother, Jimmy, and two younger sisters, Jeannie and Iris.

He was married to Hoanhi Nguyen in 1971 and to Cathryn McAbee Weber in 1989.

Richard attended Nome and Kotzebue elementary schools. He graduated from Nome High School in 1964 and from the University of Alaska with a degree in Business Administration in 1968.

He received a commission as a 2nd Lieutenant in the Army through the University of Alaska Army ROTC program. He served two tours of duty in Vietnam in Military Intelligence where he attained the rank of Captain and was awarded a Bronze Star. He later served with the Alaska Army National Guard in Nome.

On returning to Nome he took over management of the family owned air taxi operation, Foster Aviation, which had been started by his father in 1946.

Richard became very involved in community affairs and served on several boards including Bering Straits Native Corporation, Sitnak Native Corporation, Nome Eskimo Community, Northwest Community College and many civic organizations.

In 1981 he was elected to the Nome City School Board and to the Nome Common Council in 1984. He was elected to the Alaska House of Representatives in 1988 where he had served nearly 21 years at the time of his death. During all of that time he was a member of the Bush Caucus. He chaired and served on numerous committees. He was Majority Whip from 1993 to 2007. His longest tenure was on the House Finance Committee where he served from 1993 until his death. In the Legislature he kept the needs of rural Alaska and his district in the forefront, even when his position was not popular.

In 2005, he received the Patrick Henry Award from the National Guard Association of the United States (NGAUS). It is the civilian counterpart to the Guard's Distinguished Service Award and is given in recognition of outstanding and exceptional service to the Armed Forces of the United States and the National Guard.

In 2009, he was honored as a University of Alaska Distinguished Alumni because of his dedication to public service.

One of the special things about Richard was his lack of pretension. He had a great love of life which was reflected in his memory and consideration for others. He remembered birthdays, sent cards and gifts, knew your spouse's name, your children's names and how old they were. He was known for his jokes and his infectious laughter which could be heard down the hall long before he arrived at the office. Both legislators and the public looked forward to his birthday roasts which he did under special orders for several years. His poster boards which span two decades are a collage of people whom he photographed during session. Extra prints were made into post cards, given captions, and sent to the people who visited his office. He did not let politics stand in the way of friendship and was loved and respected by people in both the majority and the minority. He could be generous to a fault and would literally give a person or organization his last dollar.

His special interests included the history of the Seward Peninsula and military history, particularly the Civil War and World War II. He was interested in and an avid collector of military weapons of all kinds and loved to make a machine gun "rock" when he had the ammunition.

He loved Nome and loved being out in the surrounding country, going on picnics and going to Hannum Creek where he spent his summers working on the family mining claims. During the summer of 2002 Richard, his sister, Iris, and son, Neal, walked the 80-mile historic mining trail from Quartz Creek to Hannum Creek for the experience of seeing what it was like for the "old timers."

Family was very important to him and he often showed pictures and told people about his family ties on the Seward Peninsula. Richard always had pictures of his children, sister and wife displayed in the office.

His office became the home of a long-running session tradition, Friday at Fosters, where he kept time to the music with his instrument of choice, the knife and hammer. People gathered in his office on Friday after work and participated in the jam sessions which he sponsored for over 17 years. He tried to keep politics out of it and all were welcome. The group included legislators, staff, administration, lobbyists and visitors to the Capitol.

Richard is survived by his wife, Cathryn, of Eatonville, Wash.; seven sons, Neal Foster of Nome, James Foster of Anchorage, Nathan Foster of Ellendale, N.D.; 1st Lt. Jason Weber, LCpl Richard Foster, Ramsey Foster and Chandler Foster all of Eatonville, Wash.; and two daughters, Maria Stevens of Tacoma, Wash., Tiffany Sanchez of Miami, Okla.; and sister Margaret "Iris" Magnell of Laguna Hills, Calif.

He was preceded in death by his parents, Willie and Jane, his brother, James, and sister, Jeannie.

Services will be held in Nome Friday, Oct. 30 at 3 p.m. at the Nome Recreation Center. Interment will be at the family plot at Hannum Creek during the summer of 2010.

A memorial service will be held in Anchorage on Friday, Nov. 6 at 2 p.m. at the National Guard Armory at Fort Richardson.

Those who wish to make memorial donations to fund a dialysis center in Nome can send donations to Arctic ICAN's Foster Memorial Dialysis Fund, P.O. Box 610, Nome, AK 99762.

U.S. Sen. Mark Begich

U.S. Sen. Mark Begich released the following statement on the passing of Rep. Richard Foster:

"I was saddened to learn of the death of Richard Foster. Rep. Foster served the people of Alaska for more than two decades and committed himself to improving the lives of those he represented. The people of Nome had an ardent advocate who was always working on ways to make rural Alaska stronger and healthier.

"Alaska has lost a true public servant. My thoughts and prayers are with Rep. Foster's family, friends and wide circle of colleagues across this state."

U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski

U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, issued

the following statement on the passing of Rep. Richard Foster:

"I am deeply saddened to learn of Richard Foster's passing. Richard and I served in the Legislature together. Richard was a kind and thoughtful man who would, among other gestures, lead the birthday song for other members of the Legislature. Richard loved Alaska history and, in his spare time, he would pore through the archives, reading old newspaper accounts about life in Alaska. He would share copies of stories about my mother's family when they lived in Nome in the 1930s. He also sent "pick-me up" postcards to members, which also brought smiles. On so many occasions during serious and tense moments of debate, Richard was the one who would make a joke and bring some levity to the room. Richard was a fierce representative of the people of Nome and rural Alaska, and always looked out for their best interests.

Preventing fever may weaken body's response to vaccination

By Bob Lawrence, MD
Alaska Family Doctor

A study out of Europe this month may change the way we use medication, like acetaminophen, to prevent fever in children after routine immunization injections.

Low-grade fever is a common and largely normal response to vaccination in children and adults up to 72 hours after injection. Experts believe a low-grade fever after vaccination is a sign of a positive response to the injection.

In the 1980s, acetaminophen, commonly sold as Tylenol, was shown to lower the risk of post-vaccination fever and irritability. Since then the use of acetaminophen has become routine. Now, experts believe that preventing a normal low-grade fever may prevent the vaccination from being effective.

Last week, researchers from the Czech Republic published findings of a study in the journal Lancet showing that lowering the risk of fever with acetaminophen comes at a price. According to the research, acetaminophen may hamper a proper immune response to the vaccination. In the study, 459 healthy children were divided into two groups. Both groups received a common series of vaccinations, similar in most respects to the series given to children in the United States. The first group received acetaminophen for 24 hours after their initial shots and again after subsequent booster shots. The second group received no acetaminophen.

The group receiving acetaminophen had significantly fewer fevers compared with the group of children who did not receive medication at the time of vaccination. Children who received acetaminophen did not show as strong of an immune response as the children who received no medication. This poor response persisted for some vaccinations even after booster shots were given. In other words, by preventing fever, acetaminophen may inadvertently block the ability of a vaccine to cause an effective immune response. In a sense it is like telling an athlete to lift weights to become stronger, then removing the heavier weights because it gives the athlete sore muscles.

In the case of vaccinations, low-grade fever is associated with a positive response to the vaccine, and medication is not needed to reduce a low-grade fever. Experts, therefore, recommend reserving the use of medications like acetaminophen to treat discomfort instead of using the medication merely to reduce a fever.

The new data shows that the routine use of acetaminophen may be unwarranted for otherwise healthy children after vaccinations. Talk with your provider about how this new data applies to you and your children.

• Foster tributes

“Richard’s passing is a real loss for the people of Nome, and for our state. He truly was one of my favorite people. He genuinely loved people and he was loved in return. I extend my sincere sympathies to his family, friends and colleagues during this difficult time.”

U.S. Rep. Don Young

Alaskan Congressman Don Young released the following statement today on the passing of Rep. Richard Foster:

“Alaska suffers a great loss today. I have worked with Richard for years and have always known him to be an excellent advocate for the people he represents. He believed in the freedom of people and was always a staunch defender of our Second Amendment rights, an issue I hold near and dear to my heart. He always looked out for the best interests of Nome, and had a passion for public service. I am fortunate to have known and worked with him, and I extend my deepest condolences to his family, friends, loved ones, and the people of Nome. May God bless you all.”

House Bush Caucus

Rep. Reggie Joule, D-Kotzebue, and fellow members of the Alaska Legislature’s House Bush Caucus, released the following statements today regarding the death yesterday of Rep. Richard Foster, D-Nome:

“Richard Foster was the most senior member of the House of Representatives, who, since being elected in 1988, served with every majority caucus and worked hard using that position to build bridges of understanding on issues of importance to his district and all of rural Alaska.

“Richard was a public servant in many, many senses of the word. And that’s how he treated his district. Richard was a statesman. You can’t underestimate his contributions to the quality of life in Bush Alaska, from watching the budget to making sure his office was always available for the caucus.

“He was vocal about the issues that affected Bush Alaska, including suicide prevention, making sure we take care of our veterans, as well as matters before the finance committee.

“He was a very gracious man, who always made sure we gave proper thanks to those who helped us gain passage of spending items or legislation.

“His passing leaves a hole not only in our caucus, but also in the state.

“On behalf of the caucus and me, our thoughts and our prayers are with the family going forward.”

Fellow caucus members Rep. Bill Thomas, R-Haines, and Bryce Edgmon, D-Dillingham, stated the following:

“This loss of a fellow Vietnam veteran is hard to stomach,” Thomas said. “Not only to this caucus but the Veteran’s Caucus as well. He was a tireless advocate for our causes and I’ll miss him. All of Bush Alaska will miss him.”

“We played music in Richard’s office every Friday night, which was a really unique experience,” Edgmon said. “Fridays at Foster’s was just a way to get people together and put politics aside—to really get a sense of enjoyment and togetherness outside of legislative duties and just connect in that way. Richard was the real spirit and enabler of that group, so I don’t know what it’ll be like there on Friday nights during the legislative session without him. Amongst all the humor and the jokes and the temperament that disarmed people, what I’ll really take away from my time around Richard above all was that he could read people better than anyone I have ever met. When you think about Richard you think about people and all the better qualities in life, and I think Richard had that figured out better than anyone.”

Foster was the most senior member of the House Bush Caucus, whose composition is made up of the following rural legislators: House Majority Leader Kyle Johansen, R-Ketchikan; Peggy Wilson, R-Wrangell; House Minority Leader Beth Kertulla, D-Juneau; Cathy Muñoz, R-Juneau; Bill Thomas, R-Haines; John Harris, R-Valdez; Woody Salmon, D-Chalkyitsik; Alan Austerman, R-Kodiak; Bryce Edgmon, D-Dillingham; Bob Herron, D-Bethel; and Reggie Joule, D-Kotzebue.

Gail Phillips, lifelong friend and former Speaker of the House

“Alaska lost a great champion today with the passing away of Rep. Richard Foster. His years of dedicated service in the Alaska Legislature can easily be measured by the good he accomplished for our state and particularly for Northwest Alaska. Richard was the right person, in the right place, doing the right job at the right time. His life counted.

“I knew Richard for most of my life. Our families grew up together in Nome and remained close friends. Both of our families were involved in gold mining, and Richard and his father were bush pilots who provided essential air service into our remote mining sites.

“After graduating from Nome High School, Richard served valiantly and heroically in the U.S. Army in Vietnam. The military and America’s defense was a major part of Richard’s legislative agenda, and annually he made certain that Alaska’s veterans, military and National Guard were properly funded, honored and given due respect.

“Richard followed in his father’s footsteps in pioneering air routes and providing essential air service to communities in western and northern Alaska. Many times he risked his life bringing supplies to stranded miners, patients into the hospital at Nome and other missions of mercy. Foster Aviation provided dependable and reliable essential air service for many years.

“Richard served the State of Alaska honorably in the Alaska Legislature for over 20 years. He was first elected to office from Nome in 1988 and was continually re-elected by wide margins of support from his constituents. As the legislative representative from Northwest Alaska, Richard was responsible for countless improvements in transportation, education, health care and law enforcement. He worked tirelessly for the folks of Northwest Alaska and his efforts are evident in every city, village and community in his district.

“Richard loved mining. He was happiest when he was out “digging in the muck” searching for the elusive yellow color of gold. He spent many summers working his claims on Hannum Creek. The amount of gold he was able to extract never mattered to him as much as the joy and happiness he felt just being out in his remote camp; at peace with himself, the land and nature.

“Richard Foster was recently honored by the University of Alaska Fairbanks Alumni Association with its Distinguished Alumnus award. He certainly was one of Alaska’s and the University of Alaska’s true success stories. He steadfastly put his life and his education to work for the people of Alaska. He was an “old school” political person—one you could count on to do the right thing, one who kept his promises, one who firmly believed in the people he represented. Richard will be greatly missed—not only in the Legislature but also by family and friends throughout the State of Alaska.”

House Speaker Mike Chenault

House Speaker Mike Chenault, R-Nikiski, was shocked and saddened to learn of the death of longtime Nome Rep. Richard Foster.

“Rural Alaska and Nome have lost a truly dedicated public servant today,” Chenault said. “Richard’s sense of humor and camaraderie were hallmarks of the state House. He was a tireless advocate for his district and all of rural Alaska’s needs. Our sympathies and prayers go out to Cathy and their family. Richard was an institution in this state, and he’ll be sorely missed.”

Foster served 11 terms in the House, beginning in 1988.

Rep. Les Gara

Richard Foster’s passing was sad for many of us. As someone who worked with him in the Legislature, I thought I’d let you know how we felt about him. Richard had a unique ability to keep tempers down in a place where tempers fly too often. He was funny, polite, smart and cared for the people he represented. He knew politics was about bringing people up, not tearing them down. He knew it was about treating people as friends instead of as enemies.

You can be proud that Richard never did the things I see as the worst in politics. He didn’t give in to the worst temptations. Politics at its worst sees some use their power to block needed policy that would help the state, just because they don’t like the person or the party of the person promoting the idea. That, sadly, happens frequently in politics, and while many don’t do that, too many do. Richard took his oath to better the state seriously, and knew it was more important than to act out of anger or pettiness.

His most important legacies involved him treating us all with respect and honor. It made him the most liked person in the Legislature. And while he often didn’t vote with me, he never tried to turn political differences into animosity. He did the opposite.

To this day, he’s the only legislator who ever called me with this opening line: “Hi, Les. What’s your Social Security number?” He’s one of the few I would have given it to. It turns out, he needed it so that a few days later he could give me a shiny Derringer pistol for my birthday. Not too many legislators are well-liked enough to give a weapon to another politician. I still have the Derringer. And the picture he took of me wearing his gag pop-out eyeball eyeglasses. And the battered drill. And the memories of a very good person who battled illness for too long.

I and my wife, Kelly, have a long-planned family vacation during Richard’s services, and will be out of state. So I won’t get to share these thoughts personally in Nome. But I thought you should know how much we liked the person you chose to represent you in the Legislature.

With sympathies and sadness for your loss,

Rep. Les Gara

Gov. Sean Parnell

Gov. Sean Parnell has ordered state flags to be lowered to half-staff in honor and memory of Rep. Richard Foster.

“I served with Richard as his colleague in the Legislature,” Parnell said. “He was kind-hearted, had an infectious laugh, and a grand sense of humor. Richard treated people with respect and was a smart, humble, unassuming legislator. He served Alaska well, and we will miss him.”

State flags were lowered to half-staff Oct. 16.

CT Scan becomes reality...

Four years ago, the Arctic ICANS, a local cancer awareness group based in Nome, planted a seed which has become a reality for the Bering Strait Region. The Arctic ICANS approached the NSHC Board of Directors regarding the necessity to add a CT (Computer Tomography), also known as "CAT" Scan to Norton Sound Health Corporation. The Board of Directors were committed to improving diagnostic capabilities and increasing access to CT Scans locally and they were determined to make this possible. Six months later, Mary Frances Haynes made a private donation in the amount of $200,000 which got the ball rolling. Mary Frances Haynes from the state of Florida, made the private cash donation in honor of her son, Robert Alfred Haynes and her parents Duncan L Macdonald and Frances Bishop Macdonald of Candle, Alaska. Her son was Robert Alfred Haynes whom had spent time working for Norton Sound Health Corporation. NSHC will begin operating the 16-slice CT Scan sometime after the second week of November, 2009. A CAT Scan is a computer-enhanced scanning technique for analyzing x-ray pictures of lung, bone, soft tissue, and blood vessels with superior clarity. CT enables doctors to detect a wide range of abnormalities with such precision that it can greatly improve the level of care provided by your doctor. CT is not only used to diagnose problems such as cancers, cardiovascular disease, infectious disease, trauma, and musculoskeletal disorder, but also to monitor the progress of treatment. A number of CT Scans can be performed depending on the part of the body being examined: abdomen, chest, head, pediatric, pelvis, sinuses, and spine. NSHC will perform contrast and non-contrast studies. Contrast injections are sometimes required to see certain structures with more clarity. With a contrast CT, we may take pictures before the injection and then repeat the pictures after the injection. NSHC has conservatively estimated that 700 CT Scans will be performed during the first year. NSHC would like to express their appreciation and gratitude to the following donors: Mary Frances Haynes (private contribution), $200,000; Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation, $100,000; Murdock Foundation, $206,000; Denali Commission, $550,218; and Bering Straits Native Corporation, $5,000.

Providing a safe place to stay...

Patient Hostel

The Patient Hostel is a new facility that has been operating and occupied since October, 2008. It is comprised of two wings, the Patient and Pre-Maternal Home. It has 22 hotel style units. One wing is comprised of 14 units (26 beds) and houses patients who travel to Nome for medical appointments/medivacs. The other wing has 3 handicap accessible units and 8 units house the Pre-Maternal home patients. The Pre-Maternal Home wing includes a full kitchen and dining area, along with a common use area. The entire facility is staffed 24 hours a day, 7 days a week.

Increasing patient safety...

Norton Sound Health Corporation (NSHC) has just purchased a Pyxis machine which will automate the distribution, management, and control of medications. The system includes a network of secure-storage units, or stations which will be located in the inpatient unit, emergency department, and in our long term care unit (QCC). Each station is controlled by its own microprocessor and functions much like a bank's automated teller machine.

This system/machines will reduce the chances of medication errors significantly, hence increasing patient safety. The system will reduce costs and improve revenue generating opportunities for NSHC. It is believed that two out of 100 hospital admissions experience a preventable adverse drug event.

With this new innovation coming to Nome, NSHC is confident that there will be an improvement in patient care and safety.

Laboratory Services at your Front Door

Tim Dossey hard at work in the lab.

The lab is working on a Point of Care Testing (POCT) Program that will move testing out of the lab. With new technology, we are able to do more fingerstick testing that will decrease your wait time and reduce your visits to the Nome Laboratory. We will be offering more testing in each village clinic, thus reducing your travel to Nome, and we will also be utilizing machines that will check your blood if you are on Coumadin. All of this testing must strictly adhere to quality assurance measures. This POCT program will begin later this month.

School board approves contract for planning consultant

By Tyler Rhodes

The Nome School District will soon be drawing from its ranks, local organizations and community members as it forms the plan that will guide it through the next several years.

Superintendent Jon Wehde presented school board members Oct. 13 with a memorandum of agreement to bring on board former Alaska Commissioner of Education Jerry Covey to conduct a strategic planning process for the district. Covey owns JSC Consulting, an agency that facilitates such plans for entities throughout the state.

The agreement calls for the district to pay Covey $1,400 a day plus travel expenses for the eight-day process expected to take place over the next several months. The meetings, held in two-day sets, are set to begin Oct. 26.

While the memorandum presented to the board did not stipulate the number of days the contract would cover, the board approved it Oct. 13 with the stipulation that the charges not exceed eight days of work. The funds for the planning process will come from the federal stimulus package and were allotted to the school district. From this particular pot of money, the district had wide discretion in how it was spent.

Another contract placed before the board will have to wait until its next meeting before gaining its blessing. The $33,885 contract from SystemsHOUSE would cover preventative maintenance on the automated heating and ventilation systems at Nome-Beltz and the elementary school. The computer-controlled system is designed to run the schools' systems in the most efficient manner possible.

Board member Lynette Schmidt questioned the cost of the contract. "That is a big chunk of money," she said. "I'm trying to find out if that is a reasonable amount."

Wehde said the complexity of the system requires it be serviced by a contractor. "Right now we are truly in an in-between time of expertise," he said. Wehde noted that the contract contains provisions for training district maintenance staff on the system and added that by running the systems more efficiently, the system saves money by using less heating oil and electricity.

Wehde did not have an official contract to present the board, but did have the letter from SystemsHOUSE outlining its proposal for the service. The letter offered the maintenance for two years at the rate of $33,885 for each year.

"When I see that amount, I see an upper elementary aide position," Schmidt said.

Wehde noted, at board president Barb Nickels' suggestion, that board member Albert McComas, who was not present at the Oct. 13 meeting, was in support of the contract. McComas represents the board on a facilities committee for the district.

Returning to the board after an absence of a few months, newly elected board member Gloria Karmun questioned if the contract between the district was time-sensitive. She noted that if it were not, the board could vote on the issue at a future meeting after having been able to review the contract in full.

Wehde said holding off on the vote would not be a problem and could be settled the next time the board convenes.

In other money matters, the district's technology director, Robin Johnson, announced that Nome had its E-rate funding approved from the last school year to the tune of nearly $223,000. The funds cover the cost of telecommunication and internet access at the district's schools.

Activity concerns

Board member Kirsten Timbers questioned what the high school charges for activity fees for students who participate in extracurricular activities. Wehde responded that a $50 fee is incurred with each sport or activity in which a student participates. He said he had received one letter from a community member who was concerned over the cost. Wehde also noted that the fee can be waived based on need.

Karmun questioned whether the high school had ever approached any of the area Native corporations or entities to see if they would sponsor activity fees for their members' or shareholders' children who could not afford to pay. She volunteered to broach the idea to see if the organizations would help, allowing the students to participate and the district to gain the funds to cover that participation.

Also in the realm of extracurricular activities, Timbers questioned the possibility of the return of the activity bus. A victim of last year's budget cuts, the activity bus in past years shuttled Nanook fans between Nome and the Nome-Beltz campus for sporting events.

Timbers wondered if remaining stimulus funds coming to the district could be used to bring back the bus. Schmidt questioned whether some sort of scaled-back version of the service could be implemented, such as vans.

The activity bus is slated to be discussed at the board's next work session scheduled for Oct. 27.

If the service is again running by December, its riders should be able to see the Lady Nanooks basketball team playing with new uniforms. In an effort to support breast cancer awareness, Coach Doug Boyer reported to the board that the team decided to seek donations to get pink uniforms for the season. The uniforms will still also feature the Nome-Beltz colors of royal blue and black.

Boyer said the girls got the idea after seeing another team wear similar uniforms while competing in a tournament in Washington state. The uniforms were paid for by Nome's arm of the Alaska Cabaret, Hotel, Restaurant and Retailers Association through the efforts of the Arctic ICANS cancer survivors support group. The girls should be sporting the new uniforms at their Dec. 12 home game.

Administration reports

Nome-Beltz Principal Janeen Sullivan reported to the board that all of 2009's graduates received their diplomas by passing the High School Graduation Qualifying Examination. She said this year 71 percent of the juniors have passed all three sections of the test while 80 percent of seniors have passed. Seniors still have two more chances to pass the tests before graduation, while juniors still have four opportunities.

Sullivan also reported a spike in students calling in sick in mid-October. Up until then, she said the number of students out of school due to illness had been consistent with previous years. "We were real stable for a real long time until this week," she said. "Yesterday and today we've seen a real big increase with kids out sick."

In an attempt to make herself available to parents closer to the city's center, Sullivan reported that she had a few takers come meet with her at Airport Pizza for her inaugural "Coffee with the Principal." With the high school/junior high campus a couple of miles out of Nome's center, Sullivan hopes making herself available during the mid-morning in town once a month will provide parents more opportunity to give feedback and feel involved with the schools. Sullivan plans to hold the coffee hour through the fall and then assess its effectiveness.

Sullivan also reported that the school is working with the Boys and Girls Club in Nome to get supportive services toward either finishing high school or getting their GED. In related news, board president Nickels reported that the Boys and Girls Club is still hanging on despite the threat of closing due to dried up funds. Nickels, who is on the club's advisory committee, said the club received a four-week extension to keep running based on a grant Nome Community Center Director Lance Johnson had completed. Nome's Boys and Girls Club, like many others around the state, has fallen victim to a funding snafu at the federal level. The shortfall in funding has left clubs around the state to either shut their doors or scramble for other sources of money to keep open.

In her report to the board, Nome Elementary School Principal Shari Biscotti said the school is working to hire a new cook. "I've had my share of kitchen experience," she said. Tim Adkins has also joined the staff as a new special education teacher.

Biscotti reported on the progress at Nome Preschool and the Head Start programs that have district-funded teachers this year. She said the day has been lengthened from two to four hours at the preschool. She said the efforts are starting to bear fruit with the preschool students showing marked progress with language skills.

Todd Hindman delivered an update from the Anvil City Science Academy, the district's charter school. Hindman noted that students from the school scored in the top 92 percentile in the state for improved individual test scores in the Standards Based Assessments.

Hindman also reported that Degnan Lawrence was named September's student of the month at the school. "Degnan is a mature kid who is a great role model for the eighth graders—he being a sixth grader," Hindman said.

Hindman updated the board on the school's continued work with Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. and Charlie Lean to restore salmon habitat. Students helped Lean to collect salmon and examine their ear bones to determine whether they were fish they raised.

State senators reveal energy recommendations

By Diana Haecker

In an ambitious document that simultaneously calls for energy conservation, investment in renewable energy resources and further aggressive development of oil and gas resources, two State senators hope to lay the groundwork for a future state energy plan.

Senate energy and resource committee co-chairs Lesil McGuire (R-Anchorage) and Bill Wielechowski (D-Anchorage) on Monday released their state energy policy recommendations in form of a 50-page document, calling for several measures of conserving energy while advocating for continued oil and gas development at NPR-A, ANWR and the outer continental shelf.

At a press conference Wielechowski and McGuire revealed their draft recommendations as a document for public review. In an interview with The Nome Nugget, Wielechowski said the recommendations came about after six months of field hearings held throughout Alaska – Nome not included. They also worked with the Governor's office, the Alaska Energy Authority, Alaska and lower 48 energy experts and looked at solutions that other states and foreign countries have employed to rein in energy costs. The stated number one goal of the document is to "ensure that all Alaskans have access to reliable energy supplies at the lowest cost over the long-term."

He said the purpose of the draft recommendations was to provide a roadmap to the full Senate as they enter discussions on how to transition Alaska from fossil fuel dependency to utilizing renewable energy while still developing oil and gas resources that fill the state's coffers. About 90 percent of the state's revenue stems from oil and gas production taxes.

The document is divided not by region but by categories such as power generation, heating, energy efficiency, investing in renewable energy, energy affordability, continued resource development and technology development.

Among the recommendations are to continue funding for the Power Cost Equalization program at its current level of $37 million, to invest an additional $150 million in the state's weatherization program and $50 million in the home energy rebate program. They also recommend expanding the state's heating assistance program to include families who earn up to 350 percent of the poverty level in years when oil averages over $75 per barrel and surplus funds are available.

The senators said that when oil prices skyrocket, heating costs become a burden even for middle-income Alaskans. A recommendation also includes ensuring that Alaskans pay a fair price for the energy they consume by looking into legislation for price gouging. "One tool other states have employed to control costs is to prohibit sellers from charging excessive and exorbitant prices for products consumers rely on and to require them to justify those prices when they're necessary," reads the draft paper.

Recommendations that are of consequence for rural Alaska include to add funds for loans upgrading power systems across the state; increase funding to improve the efficiency of diesel power plants; continue to fix bulk fuel storage facilities and to contemplate a state-wide cooperative to purchase bulk fuel. The draft also touches on conservation as a means to the end of stretching energy resources. With a goal of reducing statewide demand for electricity and heating fuels by 10 percent by the year 2015, the senators recommend appliance rebate programs, to fund so-called smart meters that tell consumers how much energy which appliance uses at any given time, and to launch a big public education campaign including bringing energy efficiency and conservation."

Asked how these opposite goals could be reconciled, Wielechowski said that while the vast majority of Alaskan fossil fuels are for export and while production is declining seven percent annually, the state depends on the income generated by these resources. "The country is not going to shift in the next 15 to 20 years in terms of needing fossil fuels, but in order to stem the tide, we should start investing that money in renewable energy systems," said Wielechowski. He added that Alaska is in a transitional period and that the legislature has to prepare now to ensure a future of affordable energy for Alaskans. The Anchorage legislator said, "The message is that there is a light at the end of the tunnel. We recognize the suffering going on across

Alaska and we felt it needs to be addressed with policy recommendations." He added that it's a living document and that it is meant to be out in the public for review. "If people have comments or ideas please efficiency lessons into classrooms across the state.

Tackling renewables, the document recommends incentives to develop renewable resources by granting a state production tax credit, to establish low-interest loans for businesses and homeowners to invest in renewable energy systems and to consider legislation to institute a net-metering program.

The draft document lists seven goals and on top of the list are development of Alaska's resources and continued exploration and development of Alaska's oil and gas. Goal number four, however, states: "to reduce the dependence of Alaskan communities on fossil fuels for electricity and heat by developing our renewable and alternative energy resources and by promoting energy let us know. This is meant to be a conversation."

McGuire also encouraged public discussion and said she hopes that the public will weigh in and comment on it.

She told reporters at the press conference that the administration and state energy coordinator Steve Haagenen are working on recommendations as well as the State House subcommittee on energy. "Then the messy sausage working begins and we work out a combination of all three policy recommendations," McGuire said. ## Saying It Sincerely

By Pastor Everett Arnold, Our Savior Lutheran Church for the Nome Ministerial Association

At times we need to get back to the basics: God loves us; so, we love each other.

In a town where I was pastor an agreement was drawn up between the Lutheran, Episcopalian, and Roman Catholic churches there. Every month a group of members from those churches gathered. They planned things the churches could do together. At this time of year it would be a gathering of Christmas gifts for children living on welfare. Child Welfare Services would provide gift tags with age, sex, clothing need and size written on them. Members of the congregations took them home, bought, gift-wrapped and returned to their churches with them. All the gifts from all the churches were gathered into one – a pile of gifts 3 feet high, 3 feet thick and across the front of the hosting church. There was a special worship service to dedicate them.

They also planned times the three churches could worship together, socialize together, and serve community holiday dinners together. Nobody in town had to eat a holiday dinner alone. I got to know those people who planned these events. They were people who had been hurt. They knew the pain of church people responding to God's love in unloving ways. So they dedicated themselves to bringing love and mutual respect among their Lutheran, Episcopalian, and Roman Catholic congregations. God was writing on their hearts. They were loving God and neighbor together. They were getting back to the basics.

In Jeremiah 31:33-34 our Lord says: I will put my law within them, and I will write it on their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. Jesus said the greatest commandment is to love God whole-heartedly; the second, to love our neighbor as ourselves. Those are the basics.

Jesus Christ writes on our hearts. He writes, "Love one another as I have loved you." We may feel the pen writing on our hearts when we feel the pain He suffers with us. On Holy Thursday, we feel the sorrow of His Last Supper with His disciples. We leave worship with His love and compassion written on our hearts. On Good Friday we gather at the foot of His cross. We feel His suffering for us. We know His taking our mistakes, our regrets, our failures, our sins, and our death into His own holy body on Good Friday. We leave worship with His loving mercy written on our hearts. Then comes Easter. We gather again. He has been raised. Our Living Lord Jesus Christ meets us. Our Living Savior meets us, and He is writing love on our hearts.

This is how God fulfills the prophecy: "...and I will write it on their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people." It's how He writes His love note on each of our hearts now. So we might find creative ways to love each other. This is getting back to the basics.

Dear Editor,

I am writing in response to a letter published in last week's issue. It was the only letter printed.

The Dome building was built by a large crew of local workers. It brought in a much-needed source of income for many people who were at the time very indebted to the City. It had more than ample room for the size of our community. The problem with the building was the fact that no one had the skills to maintain it, (after the city manager at the time quit.)

The City Shop was a place that was well maintained and had tools to complete every job imaginable. At the time the building material and some of the supplies came in two separate Conex vans that were placed behind the shop/washeteria. They still remain in the spot where they were placed several years ago. Inside of them was the entire contents of the HVAC system, and tools up the wazoo. Once again after the City Manager left due to health rea-absorbed and stores an estimated 800 million metric tons of global carbon. At the rapid rate of climate change in the Arctic – about twice that of lower latitudes – the Arctic as a carbon storage facility could make the Arctic a source of carbon dioxide instead. On the scale of a few decades, the thawing permafrost could also result in a more waterlogged Arctic, says McGuire, a situation that could encourage the activity of methane-producing organisms. Methane is a very potent greenhouse gas. If the release of Arctic methane accelerates, global warming could increase at much faster rates, say the researchers.

NOAA denies protection for spotted seals

The fNational Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the federal agency tasked to manage ice seals, last week denied a petition to list spotted seals under the Endangered Species Act. The Center for Biological Diversity had filed a petition asking for protection for the spotted seal, saying that the seals' habitat is rapidly melting away in the face of global warming.

The center argued that climate projections indicate that the spotted seal would lose 40 percent of its winter sea ice habitat in the Bering and Okhotsk seas off Alaska and Russia by 2050. NOAA acknowledges that sea ice in the Arctic is rapidly melting. The agency concludes that the ice-dependant spotted seal will either adapt to life on land or migrate to better habitat elsewhere.

NOAA found that only a small population at the southern fringe of the species' range was imperiled. The agency proposed listing of seals as endangered in Liaodong Bay, China and Peter the Great Bay, Russia due to the threats of diminishing sea ice. NOAA will release a finding for the ringed and bearded seals by November 1, 2010. NOAA scientists decided earlier this year to deny Endangered Species Act protection to the ribbon seal.

Army National Guard sponsors Iron Dog

Last week, the Iron Dog snowmachine race announced that after losing their main sponsor Tesoro, the Army National Guard came forward to be the presenting partner for the 2010 Iron Dog race. The Army National Guard and Iron Dog officials say the race and the Army National Guard recruitment efforts share the same age group. Young 18- to 35-year olds are prime age group for the Alaska Army National Guard and other Military services, an Iron Dog press release said.

The Alaska Army National Guard has a goal to recruit 300 new people this year and to that end, the world's longest snowmachine race through small Alaskan rural villages allows the Guard to increase current recruiting efforts. Last year, the Guard sponsored Iditarod rookie musher Harry Alexie to spearhead recruitment efforts along the Iditarod trail.

sons the shop and two vans went to the weather.

As far as the shelter cabin goes, everyone in town thinks that a 5,000+ sq. ft. home is built from the materials of a 12x18 shelter cabin. Let's do the math.; 12 times 18 equals 216 sq.ft. Hmm 5,000 versus 216, seems like a very big difference there. Go figure.

The shelter cabin at Buck Creek is not and never has been locked. It more than one time has been used as a shelter cabin for stranded travelers. I do, however, know that more than one time it has snowed over and the door has been ice-locked by ice dams from melting, blowing snow. There was a window placed in the front entry for such cases. Bottom line, no one is denied entry to the cabin.

The polar bear and cub mentioned in the letter was in fact shot by an Eskimo. It was injured and was hunting the local reindeer herd. The cub was killed because the Elder in the party at the den site said it could not be left to starve and die, as it could not fend for itself.

Bottom line is that the bickering and finger pointing at stuff that has happened 20-30 years ago is frivolous and a good waste of ink. What should have been written is the fact the local entities are being run by people who are robbing us (Wales) blind. The presidents are forever denying audits on their books; they keep all financial information locked away from public sight. Our community keeps reelecting the same people to the governing bodies of our town, and yet we wonder why our town is going backward instead of forward. When someone, who wants to make change for the better is miraculously elected to an office they are chased out by the ones who wish to continue to better their own pockets and not worry about the community which they were elected to serve.

So I say, when is the community of Wales going to wake up and quit talking about how it was and make it like that. I guess to do that you would have to want your children to have a town to be proud of, and it would also mean that you or they would have to get out of bed first.

One final note, what a nice way to treat the owner of the vehicle used to transport the sick to the airport, including the author of last week's letter. Just one of many things that the person in which the derogatory was written about in last weeks issue.

Letter to the Editor:

This year's AFN convention is just around the corner, and for those headed to Anchorage I want to be among the first to welcome you to the gathering. AFN is one of Alaska's truly great family reunions, and visiting with you at AFN is one of the things I most look forward to each year.

Your congressional delegation will again staff a booth at this year's convention, and I want to invite you to drop by to say hello. I have asked several of my legislative staffers to attend this year's convention, and they will be available to discuss federal issues or problems that you may be having with the federal government.

I am scheduled to speak on Friday afternoon and hope that you can be there for the discussion. As your United States Senator, I made a commitment to listen to our Native people, to respect your Native cultures and traditions and to support the needs of your villages. AFN is always a wonderful opportunity for me to let you know the progress we have made on your behalf during the past year. I look forward to visiting with you in Anchorage, and wish you all a great convention! Sincerely,
Lisa Murkowski

Sgt. Maj. Aukongak blazes path for Native women

Through hard work, goal setting and devotion, Lillian Aukongak has climbed the ranks in the Alaska Army National Guard over her 23-year career to make the rank of sergeant major.

Sgt. Maj. Aukongak's accomplishment, however, carries more than just personal significance. An Inupiaq, Aukongak is the first Alaska Native woman to attain the highest enlisted rank possible in the National Guard. She was pinned Oct. 1 in a promotion ceremony held at the Alaska National Guard Armory.

Born in Nome and having grown up in Golovin and White Mountain, Aukongak enlisted in the Guard in Nome Oct. 14, 1986. She started her career as a radio operator for 1/297th Infantry (Scout) Battalion. Aukongak held several different jobs and moved up the ranks quickly.

She joined the Active Guard Reserve program in 1991, but the idea of earning a college degree stayed at the front of her mind. Aukongak began taking college courses while working full-time and received her bachelor's degree in Human Services in 2007.

Aukongak's drive and determination developed after life dealt her a tough blow early on. Orphaned at age 6, she and her seven sisters and two brothers were split up and put into foster care. Aukongak was the second to the youngest and paired up to live with her younger sister.

Despite the separation, Aukongak said she looked up to her older sisters, seeking their guidance as she grew up. "Everyone has challenges and not everyone goes through what I went through," she said. "But that didn't stop me from pursuing my goals and following my dreams. I've always had very positive sisters who kind of mothered me; because I lost my parents at such a young age, I really looked up to them and admired them from a distance."

As she has climbed the ranks, Aukongak has played both the role of admirer and admired. "You have soldiers who admire you from a distance, whether you acknowledge it or not. The higher grade you make, the more you put yourself in a position to be a mentor and role model; I call it being admired from a distance," she said. "I personally have a lot of people whom I've admired from a distance. Command Sgt. Maj. Pamela Harrington and Sergeants Maj. Jane Dennis and Kerry Averett are just a few people I've admired from a distance."

Aukongak's achievement has drawn admiration from the highest ranks of the Alaska Army National Guard. "I think Sgt. Maj. Aukongak's accomplishment is a great triumph and success story," said State Command Sgt. Maj. Gordon Choate. "She is a leader who our soldiers can look up to, and she epitomizes the truth that soldiers who live the Army values can achieve the highest ranks through leadership and hard work."

PROMOTED— Sgt. Maj. Lillian Aukongak is the first Alaska Native woman to attain the highest enlisted rank possible in the National Guard. She was pinned Oct. 1 in a promotion ceremony held at the Alaska National Guard Armory.

• Coast Guard

Nome could play. “We’re still encouraging the Coast Guard using Nome as your operating base as much as possible,” Michels said.

It was Baker who voiced the main question on the mind of Nome representatives in the room, inquiring about the potential of the Coast Guard stationing a cutter permanently in western Alaska—and specifically, in Nome. Breckenridge dismissed the possibility of a base for a large cutter, adding that the Coast Guard is still taking stock of challenges and opportunities in the region. “You’re probably a half step to a step ahead of us,” Breckenridge told Baker. “We’re in the process of digesting what happened this last season.”

Colvin added that there is no perfect solution as the communities of Nome, Kotzebue and Barrow are eyed for their potential. While Nome’s port infrastructure is the most developed in western and northwestern Alaska, the harbor does have some natural disadvantages. “It’s a wonderful place as far as support goes, but the challenge is the depth of water,” Colvin said. Colvin said a pier suitable to serve the larger cutters would potentially need to extend up to a mile seaward to reach an adequate depth.

Colvin said at this point Nome would be more likely to see some sort of land-based installation rather than serve as a homeport for a cutter. Such a base could serve as a coordination center and aid in search and rescue efforts, he said. But even a scaled-back presence is not yet called for, Colvin said. “Clearly when you’re forward deployed, you can react more quickly. But it takes money to build that infrastructure,” he said.

Breckenridge added that funding any new installation would be a lengthy process. Even if all funding requirements were met, it would take a number of years before money could start flowing. “We’re really talking 2013,” she said. “The best scenario for getting something new is three years.” Breckenridge’s tone implied that such a best-case scenario is currently not envisioned.

Breckenridge said even if the Coast Guard was determined to base out of Nome it would face a series of logistical challenges in doing so. Foremost, she said, the current fleet of cutters are not made to be operated in heavy ice conditions. “The hulls cannot operate in ice. They’re not built for that,” she said. Breckenridge added that the class of large cutters are currently in the process of being decommissioned.

As noncommittal as the admirals were in regard to any Coast Guard permanence in Nome, much of the discussion with city leaders signaled future involvement in the region.

One way or the other Nome will continue to play a role as more shipping activity in the warming Arctic spurs a larger Coast Guard presence. “We know we have missions we are going to be working up here,” Breckenridge said.

At the start of the meeting, Mayor Michels distributed handouts detailing the growth in traffic and business at Nome’s port of the past 20 years or so. The number of ships stopping in Nome has increased to historic levels. In 1990, Nome saw a total of 34 dockings. In 2007 that number jumped to 184. This year, that number has jumped to 274 with a small window of ice-free water still ahead.

The increase in dockings comes as more equipment, gravel, research vessels and fuel barges pass through the region. The rise is also an indicator of more traffic through Arctic waters. Each year, more and more ships are pushing their way through the Northwest Passage, whether they are independent adventurers or even small cruise ships.

The uptick in Arctic sailings has definitely caught the Coast Guard’s attention. “With the water opening in the Arctic, we’re trying to figure out what boats work, what type of planes work, what type of helicopters work,” Colvin said.

This summer’s Arctic Crossroads Operation, which saw a large influx of Coast Guard personnel in the region for training exercises and medical visits to villages, was part of the Coast Guard’s process to acquaint itself with the realities of today’s Arctic. Colvin said the exercises proved valuable in fleshing out challenges, such as communications, and familiarizing itself with the region’s terrain in cooperative weather and without the stress of responding to some sort of emergency. Colvin said that time spent training and interacting with local sources will aid the Coast Guard in responding to future incidents in the region. “It just accelerates the timeline for operations,” he said.

More traffic also means more potential for an accident or spill. “It’s still not a huge amount of traffic,” Colvin said of the vessels attempting the Northwest Passage. “But it scares the heck out of me. I’m just hopeful that we don’t have a Titanic-like accident up here.”

“It’s on all our minds,” Breckenridge said. Breckenridge associated the emerging interest in the Arctic frontier with her generation’s drive to explore space. As the Coast Guard participates in that exploration, Breckenridge said it has to relearn some lessons from its past.

The Coast Guard had a presence in Nome more than a century ago, but over time it pulled out of the region. “You remember more of that than we do. You’ve been here and we left,” Breckenridge said. “We know we’ve been here before, but, quite frankly, we’ve lost some of that knowledge.” Breckenridge highlighted that the numerous recent visits by the Coast Guard are aimed at filling those knowledge gaps.

Part of that investigation, Breckenridge said is establishing a supply-chain system to support the operations that are occurring in the region. “What kind of spare parts do we need if we’re operating up here? Our system isn’t that mature,” she said. She did note that the Coast Guard is a little more advanced in its logistics for supporting air operations in the region than it is for its marine fleet.

The Oct. 16 meeting also allowed for Nome officials to voice more city-specific concerns. Port Director Baker asked to be given more advance notice of Coast Guard ship arrivals so that she could better route traffic at the port to make room. “Years ago a vessel could count on Nome having an open cell to be able to pull in,” she said. “Nowadays it’s a different story.”

GIFT EXCHANGE—Nome Mayor Denise Michels laughs as the Coast Guard’s Vice Adm. Jody Breckenridge presents her with a clock and compass as a gift thanking her for the city’s hospitality this summer. Michels had earlier presented Breckenridge and Rear Adm. Chris Colvin with historic photos of the Coast Guard’s presence in Nome.

Fire Chief Matt Johnson spoke to the need for more coordination between his search and rescue department and the Coast Guard. Noting that the rescue department’s marine resources are minimal at best, Johnson said rescues at sea most often require them to call out for help themselves.

Johnson also wants to find out what sort of resources would be necessary to fight a fire on a ship if such a situation were to occur while a vessel was docked in Nome. “If there are one or two connections we would need to have in our arsenal, we would like to know that,” he said.

• NovaGold

The mining firm reports spending $12.5 million so far this year at Rock Creek. NovaGold in the report says its foremost plan at Rock Creek is to “establish the structures and action plan required to ensure the project remains in compliance with all environmental regulations during next spring’s freshet.”

Indeed, runoff water has caused headaches for the mining firm at Rock Creek. This year, NovaGold agreed to pay the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency a record $883,628 (U.S. dollars) for discharges of sediment-filled water into area streams between April 2007 and September 2008.

In July, NovaGold also received a Notice of Violation from the state Department of Environmental Conservation due to its failure to comply with water treatment and injection requirements related to water in its tailings pond. To settle the violation, the firm has agreed to treat and inject water at a higher rate to reduce the build-up behind the pond’s dam. The dam was not designed to hold back water. NovaGold was not fined for the violation.

NovaGold also says it does not intend to commence development or construction at either Donlin Creek or Galore Creek for the rest of 2009. Either action, it states, would require external financing. As of Aug. 31, NovaGold reported its cash and cash equivalent holdings at $46.4 million with working capital of $38 million.

Activity at Galore Creek was halted in 2007 when the company and its project partner, Teck Resources, determined the project costs had ballooned well beyond expectations. The project became the subject of a U.S. shareholder lawsuit, portions of which were thrown out earlier this year. However, another shareholder suit has been filed in the Canadian courts for $100 million. The new suit carries similar allegations to the U.S. filings regarding when NovaGold and its partners were aware of the increased cost estimate to develop the project and when it reported those estimates to shareholders.

NovaGold describes the Donlin Creek prospect as its “flagship property.” The firm reports that it has “pre-permitting” activities underway after a feasibility study was completed earlier this year. Donlin is owned in equal shares by NovaGold and mining giant Barrick Gold. As of Aug. 31, NovaGold reported spending $11.9 million (U.S.) of the $14 million (U.S.) budgeted for 2009 at the property.

NSEDC candidate Smith sues over election results

By Laurie McNicholas

Tim Smith, a candidate in the Oct. 6 election for the Nome seat on the Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. board of directors, filed a complaint against NSEDC and a challenge to the election results on Monday in Superior Court in Nome.

The complaint states that the election of Don Stiles was improper in several respects, and it includes an allegation that Janis Ivanoff, NSEDC’s chief executive officer, called Nome voters on election day to influence their votes.

Under NSEDC’s current by-laws, the election was open to City of Nome residents and those who vote in Nome for statewide races but do not live within city boundaries. NSEDC’s bylaws also state that a candidate needs more than 40 percent of the vote to win a board seat and that NSEDC will certify the results of the election.

The election results for the NSEDC Nome representative as reported by the City of Nome listed 746 ballots cast, 738 ballots counted and 31 questioned ballots. The questioned ballots were those submitted by voters who were assumed to live outside the city limits of Nome but were qualified to vote in the NSEDC race. Of the 31 questioned ballots, only 23 were deemed valid after being verified by the state elections office in Nome. The eight ballots excluded from the count were submitted by voters who were determined to be living out of the

Slush takes the bite out of major storm

By Sandra L. Medearis

Now that most of the snow clogging the streets has gone away in city and state trucks, we have the luxury of taking an academic interest in last week’s sudden appearance of winter wonderland.

Fast and close were key words in weatherman Jerry Steiger’s account of the storm that had some folks “swimming” in and out of their homes and parking their cars down the block.

“A low pressure center developed quite quickly and close in, to the west of St. Lawrence Island,” Steiger said, explaining why the ground went from no snow to lots of snow in a couple days.

“It then moved east and over the island, over the top of Nome, and then northeast toward Kotzebue and to the interior of the state.”

A big difference between the low pressure over Nome and a high pressure to the east brought a rush of east wind and enough

Board of Game denies nearly all Unit 22 proposals

By Tyler Rhodes

Of the 13 proposals concerning the game unit encompassing Nome and the Norton Sound region, only one received the green light from the Alaska Board of Game last weekend.

The remaining dozen were either unanimously shot down or saw no action from the statewide board which met in Nome’s Mini Convention Center Nov. 13-16.

The sole proposal receiving the board’s blessing will guarantee nonresident hunters 10 percent of the drawing permits issued to hunt mature bull musk ox in Unit 22E. The proposal, as originally submitted by guide Brian Simpson, asked that a nonresident allocation be set at a hard 15 or 20 percent for the area at the northern end of the Seward Peninsula.

The current regulations allow for up to 10 percent of the permits to be issued to out-of-state hunters without a guarantee that any permits go to nonresidents. The hunt, which has been open to nonresidents since 2006, has had 20 available permits for the last several years. Unit 22 wildlife biologist Tony Gorn said one or two of those permits have gone to nonresidents each year.

In his reasoning behind the proposal, Simpson argued that residents have multiple opportunities to hunt musk ox in Unit 22E between the permit hunt, a state subsistence hunt and a

A new Rep. Foster sworn in

By Tyler Rhodes

In less than a week after being selected by Gov. Sean Parnell to fill his father’s shoes in state government, Nome’s Neal Foster was sworn in by Lt. Gov. Craig Campbell Monday as the newest member of the House of Representatives.

Foster’s swearing in came on the heels of his confirmation by House Democrats Sunday to serve the remainder of his father’s term. Both events took place in Anchorage. Parnell had traveled to Nome Nov. 10 to announce he had selected Foster for the appointment.

Foster will serve the approximate year left in the late Richard Foster’s term. The elder Foster had represented western Alaska in the House for 21 years that spanned 11 terms. He died in October of a heart attack suffered during kidney dialysis in Washington state. “It’s been a very eventful last month,” Neal Foster said after being sworn in. “It’s been a very bittersweet moment, but I am very grateful for this opportunity. And I look forward to serving not just the people of our district, but the entire state.”

Foster’s route to the seat first required him to toss his hat in the ring with six other contenders to be evaluated by a committee of Democrats

Letters

Dear Editor:

Regarding Lisa Murkowski’s town hall—How much does the bill weigh? 1,900 pages and no weight? Usually the fear mongers at least give a weight. Especially if I, the middle class, have to carry it around.

Republicans have had control for 30 years in one way or another, and you did nothing then about health-care. I fully expect you will do nothing now or in the future regarding my healthcare. I as a middleclass American, understand; I can expect nothing from the Republicans. I expected nothing from you then when you had power. I got nothing from your dad. I get nothing but grief and heartache from Rep. Young for health care. He was a no vote.

I am content with that philosophy. Although, I am still a voter. I will fight to change this destructive behavior towards our society and in particular the middle class. Here is an example, and it’s not unique.

My brother was in his early 20s in Indiana and slipped on ice and broke his back. He worked as a waiter. He had no insurance. After a costly treatment, and a few visits to physical therapy (he couldn’t afford to continue) he was cast aside. Nearly a year in bed, his means of making money stopped. He couldn’t walk. Meanwhile he was given a bill for nearly $250,000. Yes, that’s 4 zeros behind that 25.

Guess what happened next? Can you guess, Lisa? Bankruptcy!

I ask you where shall I cast my vote? To someone who wants to halt what might help my family? Your, “fend for ourselves mantra”? Health care that covers the healthy only?

You don’t expect to get my vote , do you? I pay more then $5 a gallon for fuel oil, and we have our own oil fields. We are in a war that shouldn’t be happening (I am a Gulf War vet under George the First’s reign, by the way) .

From where is your logic coming? It costs $13,000 a year apiece for health insurance for my wife and me. That does not include deductibles, or caps. Maybe if something catastrophic happens medically we will be able to keep our house. Maybe. Lisa, we need this healthcare bill.

This one is just for us—the middle-class. Especially now when there are so many unemployed. Please vote for it. You can tell your constituents whatever you like. I will help you with an excuse. Please don’t make this another power grab for the benefit of the one percent at the expense of the 95 percent.

Thank you for your time.

Brings Out the Best

Adversity brings out the good in people. This past week’s storm, which fell on the same day 35 years ago, did not pack nearly the wallop as did the notorious Storm of ’74. But, oh what a dumping of snow we got. It makes one wonder if the Department of Transportation has connections with the blizzard prognosticator. Is it really coincidence that storms hit in full force on state holidays?

Nome stores and businesses struggled to stay open and health and safety personnel kept emergency services and fire lanes open. The citizens of Nome and the communities of western Alaska know how to put their shoulders to the wheel and arms to the shovels. Stuck vehicles were pulled from ditches, neighbors helped to dig out neighbors, Folks walked with the less-sure-footed and generally were more alert to those who needed an assist. In the aftermath of the storm the City and State snow removal crews were on top of the task. The drivers of snow blowers, loaders and dump trucks must constantly be on the alert for children climbing over snow berms to get to the school bus stop, folks walking in the middle of the street where the snow has been cleared and drunks staggering too close to the wheels of danger.

We made it through the first snow of the season and we can’t put off the winter preparedness tasks. Let’s get those snow removal obstruction items out of the way, the old snowmachines that don’t work, the summertime fun toys, the junker 4-wheelers and other classic Nome treasures out of harm’s way. Let’s give the kids a talking to about street safety and make sure they wear reflective clothing. It’s hard for drivers to see pedestrians in the arctic darkness. Let’s plan ahead and be ready so that we can tell old man winter to “Bring it on!”

LET'S TALK Turkey

State of Alaska news briefs

Compiled by Diana Haecker
President Obama stops over at Elmendorf

En route to his first presidential overseas trip to Asia, US President Barack Obama landed at Elmendorf Air Force base and addressed the service men and women on November 12. Obama had spent Veteran's Day at the Army base in Fort Hood, Texas to attend a memorial for victims of last week's killings. Air Force One landed at Elmendorf in the afternoon. Obama addressed the Elmendorf soldiers in a short, 15-minute speech, conveying a simple message of gratitude. Obama also pledged to increase the pay, child care and medical support for men and women serving the country. Obama met privately with the family of fallen Anchorage-born soldier Gregory Fleury, who was killed in a helicopter crash in Afghanistan. The President's first visit to Alaska was not well attended by the state's Republican leadership. Governor Sean Parnell said he couldn't be there because he gave a speech at the annual meeting of the Associated General Contractors. Parnell said he hopes to meet the President on his return trip from Asia. US Senator Lisa Murkowski issued a statement welcoming the president to Alaska, but she was on field visits to Kotzebue and Nome. Congressman Don Young stayed in Washington. Air Force One continued on and flew to Japan later that evening.

Parnell makes maintenance priority

At a press conference at the University of Alaska Anchorage last week, Governor Sean Parnell announced a plan to tackle the backlog of deferred maintenance projects for state-owned facilities, thereby putting Alaskan construction workers to work. Parnell said he plans to submit a state capital budget that would include $100 million for deferred maintenance projects in each of the next five years. The budget will fund repair and renovation projects throughout Alaska for roads, ferries, airports, university buildings and other public facilities. Out of the $100 million, the University of Alaska would get a chunk of $37 million to bring its facilities in compliance with building standards and such. Deferred maintenance funding is necessary to preserve the state's significant investment in infrastructure and will mean Alaska's construction industry will have jobs it can depend on, each and every year, said Parnell. Parnell said the announcement at a meeting of the Associated General Contractors kept him from greeting President Barack Obama, who landed Thursday afternoon at Elmendorf Air Force Base on his way to Japan.

Alaska National Guard has new commander

With the appointment of Lt. General Craig Campbell as lieutenant governor in August, the Alaska National Guard and the Alaska state Department of Military and Veteran's Affairs was without a leader. Last week, Governor Sean Parnell named Brigadier General Thomas Katkus adjutant general and acting commissioner of the Dept. of Military Affairs.

Palin's book "Going Rogue" out this week

Former Alaska Governor Sarah Palin launched her writing career with a book that is already a bestseller, "Going Rogue" and was kicking off the national book tour on the Oprah Winfrey show on Monday. The book netted the ex-Governor $1.5 million in advance payment and is estimated to make her $5 million. In response to some loose ends left by Palin's rushed exit out of the Governor's office in July, the Alaska Democratic Party launched a website called Say NO to Sarah". A statement by the Alaskan Democrats says that the website was launched in response to former Governor Palin's refusal to provide copies of Palin emails to the public under the state's Public Records Act. Party chairwoman Patti Higgins said that the records would have shed light on government actions and that she was especially concerned when it became apparent that Palin was using not only a government e-mail account, but also a personal email address to conduct government business.

Energy plan in the making

After several House and Senate energy committees have been on the quest to hear what should and shouldn't go in a comprehensive state energy plan, the house special committee on energy held a hearing on November 17 at the 2009 Alaska Municipal League conference. Bill Popp, President & CEO, Anchorage Economic Development Corporation and Chris Rose, Executive Director, Renewable Energy Alaska Project presented a draft statewide energy policy bill. This bill and an omnibus energy bill is slated to be pre-filed for the 2010 legislative session that begins January 19 in Juneau. On the Senate side, the chairs of the Senate special committee on energy Lesil McGuire (R-Anchorage) and Bill Wielechowski (D-Anchorage) call on all Alaskans to submit comments on their draft state energy policy recommendations. The 50-page recommendations document calls for increased funding for weatherization, more energy efficient power generation, merging Railbelt utilities and providing incentives for more natural gas exploration in Cook Inlet. To submit comments by December 15 go to www.energy.ak-senate.org

Royally paid musher position open

The Denali National Park and Preserve has a job opening for the one and only federal musher to be employed at the state's most visited National park. Northern District ranger Richard Moore said the position entails caring for the kennel of 31 sled dogs, patrolling the park by dog sled in the winter and holding presentations in front of lots of tourists in the summer. The kennel's manager also has to do some administrative work and has to supervise other personnel. And the pay is not bad either, ranging from $33,477 to $66,542 plus a 25 percent cost of living adjustment. Moore couldn't say how many applications came in yet, as headquarters in D.C. are dealing with the hiring, but he said the unusual job description made his phone ring nonstop with media inquiries from the entire nation and Canada.

federal subsistence hunt. He also noted that the remote and rugged area prevents fully meeting musk ox quotas. "Many residents who draw a DX097 permit do not hunt the permit when they become aware of the logistical difficulties and expense to access the hunt area," Simpson wrote.

Board members were swayed by the low harvest of available musk ox in the unit as well as earlier testimony that residents of the area wanted to see fewer musk ox. Northern Norton Sound Advisory Committee member Roy Ashenfelter testified Nov. 13 that village residents in the unit would like to see as many musk ox taken as possible. The committee had recommended guaranteeing 20 percent of the permits to nonresidents. "It's an animal that eats the food the residents prefer eating,"

Ashenfelter told the board. "Whatever means you could implement, residents would appreciate."

Of all the opportunities to hunt musk ox in the unit, the northern portion has the most liberal quotas and hunts. The state subsistence hunt—open only to Alaska residents—allows for the taking of 62 musk ox, half of which can be cows. Gorn reported to the board that the annual harvest is generally "in the mid 20s" with fewer than 10 cows among the harvest. He said about 17 of the 20 available musk ox are taken through the permit hunt each year. "We are considerably below allowable harvest," Gorn said.

The hunt also has a long duration, with bull seasons running from Aug. 1 to March 15 and the cow season from Jan. 1 to March 15.

Board of Game Vice Chair Ted Spraker of Soldotna amended the proposal to set the guaranteed amount at 10 percent. The amendment and then the proposal as a whole passed by a 5-2 vote. Casting "no" votes were board members Ben Grussendorf of Sitka and Teresa Sager Albaugh of Tok.

Noting that only one nonresident received a drawing tag for the 2009 hunt, Grussendorf rhetorically wondered which Alaska resident would have been denied the opportunity to participate in the hunt if a second permit would have had to go to an out-of-state hunter to meet the mandatory 10 percent under the new regulation.

Other commission members, however, had no problem with increasing the opportunity for nonresidents. Board member Bob Bell of Anchorage noted that nonresident hunters provide a significant impact on the Department of Fish and Game's budget through license fees. "My point is, we should quit vilifying [nonresident hunters] so much," he said. "I think this is a very reasonable proposition."

Sager Albaugh said while she appreciates the financial contribution by nonresident hunters, she cautioned just how much effect it should have on board decisions. "It's dangerous ground to suggest that because of that, it's rationale for a specific allocation," she said.

"I disagree," Bell said. "I think it's very important we fund this department. If we call it selling [game animals], well then, let's sell them."

While Alaska resident hunters who fail to be selected for a musk ox drawing permit would still have other opportunities to hunt musk ox in Unit 22E, the drawing hunt differs in that it allows out-of-area hunters (residents or not) to keep the head and horns for their trophy value. Under the subsistence hunts throughout Unit 22, hunters face a couple of trophy destruction requirements depending on where they harvested the animal.

Musk ox horn rules remain

Loosening up the rules on just how the destruction of those musk ox horns is handled was the thrust of a proposal by Nome resident Mike Quinn.

The proposal failed to pass as the board tabled it and let it die for a lack of action. Ultimately the board asked

Gorn to bring the issue back to what is known as the musk ox cooperators group to flesh out a potential solution to the issue. "I think you've heard enough from us that you have an idea of what we'd like to see," said board chair Cliff Judkins of Wasilla. "I think that's the best approach."

Quinn had proposed that trophy destruction only occur on musk ox horns still attached to a skull that is to be removed from Unit 22. Current regulations call for horn removal from subsistence musk ox with boss horns that are taken from along the road system. For areas outside the road system, trophy destruction is required if the skull is to be removed from the unit. "Right now we basically have two different degrees of trophy destruction on the Seward Peninsula," Gorn said. He noted that the more aggressive measures implemented for the road system are an effort to reduce the number of large bulls being taken.

Last year that destruction was accomplished through the removal of HORNS AS ART—Nome artist Karen Olanna testifies before the state board of game Nov. 14 regarding her use of musk ox horns for artwork. Current subsistence hunt rules call for the destruction of horns to reduce the trophy value of the harvested animals. Olanna, who brought examples of her work, was concerned about the ability to get horns due to the rule. A proposal before the board, brought by Mike Quinn who is sitting next to Olanna, to alter the trophy destruction requirement failed to pass.

the horn tips. This year, the horns are to essentially be cut in half.

Quinn argued that the trophy destruction requirement actually hurts the subsistence value of musk ox for residents who either sell the horns or use them for handicrafts and artwork. "I request you to find that musk ox horns do have subsistence value," Quinn told the board during public testimony Nov. 14. Quinn said he deals in musk ox horns, selling them to knife makers.

Testifying with Quinn was Nome artist Karen Olanna who has used musk ox horns for several pieces of artwork, two of which she brought to the meeting. "I would urge you to look for a more creative way to limit the trophy hunters," she told the board.

Quinn's proposal did not seek to completely curtail the practice of destroying an animal's trophy value to ensure those participating in the hunt are doing so for subsistence purposes. "I'm not here to say trophy destruction has no use in this hunt," Quinn said.

Board members batted the issue back and forth quite a while, suggesting ideas ranging from changing the subsistence hunt to target only young bulls to having Fish and Game collect the horns and auctioning them off at a later time.

The issue of parity also came up. The drawing tags for musk ox in the unit come with a $500 fee for residents and $1,100 for nonresidents. Hunters who draw permits for those hunts are permitted to keep the head and horns intact, no matter where they plan to transport it. Board member Lewis Bradley of Palmer argued that it is unfair to have hunters participate in the subsistence hunt and return home with a trophy by skirting the rules.

Gorn reported that last year's subsistence hunt in Unit 22C was rife with violations, resulting in eight cases pursued by the area's wildlife trooper that netted three convictions. He also noted various schemes to preserve trophy values. "I understood there was basically bootlegging of musk ox horns," he told the board.

Gorn said the issue of trophy destruction has been controversial since its inception. "Consensus can just never be reached on the topic," he told the board.

Nome hunter Matt Culley testified at Friday's meeting that he felt the destruction requirement needed to remain. "I agree with current conditions that we need mandatory trophy destruction," he said. "Meat is most important."

Gorn reported to the board that the more stringent destruction requirements for the hunt areas along Nome's road system were designed to help reduce the harvest of the largest bulls. Gorn said the department has noticed a fast and significant drop in the bull-to-cow ratio in the population along the road system. "So the area most accessible from Nome, in response to declining bull-cow ratios, we felt that we needed to try to develop some type of mechanism to discourage the consistent harvesting of mature bulls."

Gorn reported that from 2001 to 2005, when musk ox hunting in Unit 22C near Nome was under the most restrictive Tier I system, there were more than 70 mature bulls per 100 cows. He said that number has dropped to nearly 30 mature bulls per 100 cows. "It may be necessary to reduce quotas in 22C to prevent the loss of mature bulls," he said.

If the hunters participating in the subsistence hunt are indeed not after a trophy, Gorn speculated that they may be shooting the larger bulls in Unit 22C just to be certain they are targeting a male in the bulls-only hunt. The oldest, biggest bulls have a reputation for yielding tough meat. "You may come up on a group and, darn it, you're just not sure. You've heard you should take a 3-year-old bull, but you're just not sure," Gorn said. "Maybe it's a cow. But that one on the end, with the big boss, I know that's a bull. They end up shooting

Wanton waste issue left on Board of Game's table

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Alaska Game Board backed off considering a potentially controversial proposal Saturday and tabled it for the annual meeting early next year.

Proposition 34, sponsored by the Arctic Advisory Council, if adopted and implemented in management of state game resources as originally written, would apply to game management areas 23 and 26A in easing the restrictions on leaving dead carcasses in the field. The rule change would include disease as a factor that could render meat inedible and therefore not subject to the edible meat salvage requirement. The game board amended the proposal to include all management units' statewide and tabled further action by a vote of 4-3.

Currently the law requires a hunter to salvage all edible meat under most circumstances. Under the definition of edible meat is stated that edible meat of big game does not include meat that has been damaged and made inedible by the method of taking. However, it does not include meat that has been made inedible by disease that was in the animal that was harvested. Therefore, people are legally required to salvage meat that is in fact inedible and poses a health risk to the person who consumes it, say proponents of the change.

A current case in court involves eight hunters from Point Hope charged on wanton waste of meat after an investigation showed that hunters had shot a large number of caribou and left the carcasses to rot in summer 2008. Their defense argued that the meat from unsalvaged carcasses that some investigators said numbered over 100, was diseased and therefore inedible. Since the filing of charges in March 2009, three of the Point Hope hunters have changed their pleas to guilty.

Prop. 34 modifies the definition of edible meat under the salvage requirement for Game Management Units 23 and 26A to exclude meat the hunter deems comes from a diseased animal. An amendment attached by the board before the tabling vote extends the proposal to cover all game management units statewide.

In its write-up of this proposal, Arctic Advisory Council said if the measure were OK'd and implemented, hunters would benefit who were no longer forced to break the law. If the measure went down, hunters would continue to be guilty of breaking a regulation that would not allow them to leave meat in the field that is inedible because of disease.

The board tabled the issue on a vote of 4-

3. The majority of the board argued that such a measure deserved statewide consideration for application to all units, not just a couple of units.

Board member Teresa Sager Albaugh of Tok, tried to keep the issue on the table saying that it should come to a vote up or down as other proposals on the November agenda.

The Department of Fish and Game took a stance of "no action recommended" in written comment, saying the current regulation was adequate for defining edible meat and meat salvage requirements.

"The department is also sensitive to current legal proceedings regarding meat salvage and recommends the board take no action on the proposal," the ADF&G statement said.

The Alaska Board of Game held its fall meeting at the Mini-convention Center in Nome from Nov. 13-16.

that one because they're confident it's legal. The people that have eaten musk ox can tell you that's not the one you want to eat."

In that vein, board member Bradley questioned whether restricting the subsistence hunt to 3-year-old bulls and cows where possible would be effective. Gorn said having the option to harvest a cow could give hunters more of a safety net when targeting young bulls.

"We can beat this thing to death and make all kinds of assumptions in changing seasons and so forth. Common sense tells me your subsistence hunters, if given the chance to take cows and young bulls, they would," Spraker said. I've eaten steaks from two old bulls; they're tougher than old leather. The flavor's good, but you're going to have the opportunity to chew it for a while."

Board member Bell argued against trophy destruction all together. "I just think this horn destruction idea is just a bad idea no matter where we apply it," Bell said. "I just never agreed with it, I think it's the wrong way to manage." He did acknowledge the need to address the declining bull population. "It appears we're shooting too many mature bulls. We need to find a way to fix that, but I'm not sure trophy destruction is the way to do that."

Several proposals scuttled

The board shot down several of the proposals before it in quick order.

• Same-day airborne hunts won't be extended: A proposal to allow same-day hunting for the duration of the caribou seasons throughout Unit 22 met with a unanimous "no" vote by the board. Proposed by Nome resident Tim Smith, the proposal would have applied the same-day provisions currently allowed Jan. 1 to April 15 in the unit.

Gorn said the department does not track harvest statistics by those hunting under the current same-day provisions, but estimated that the numbers are low. "We just haven't seen much participation in this opportunity," he said. "I can tell you the few people who have participated and have talked to me are pretty consistent in saying, 'Well I did that once.'"

The board was cold to the idea of increasing that opportunity. "I've never been a supporter of a same-day hunt of anything, anywhere," Grussendorf said. "I don't want to deny a person the opportunity of the great outdoors. If a person has to spend a night, he or she is going to think of taking the animals out. So I do not support this proposal."

Spraker said while he feels the health of the population would not be a concern in opening up more opportunity, the potential for conflicts with aircraft competing with other hunters was enough reason to deny it. "There's plenty of opportunity, generous bag limits, plenty of caribou. I'm still not in favor of this one," he said.

"I'm not going to vote for this either," chairman Judkins said. He was good for his word as the proposal fell 0-7.

• 22B moose season won't be delayed: A proposal to start the moose season on Sept. 17 in the portion of Unit 22B that covers White Mountain, Golovin and Council also went down by a 0-7 vote. The proposal, submitted by the Chinik Eskimo Community, would have run the season from Sept. 17-30 instead of the current Sept. 1-14. The proposal also asked that the permit for the hunt only be available in Golovin and White Mountain.

The backers of the proposal argued that by starting the hunt later, there would be less chance of meat spoiling due to warmer weather.

Henry Ivanoff declines Siu Alaska Corp. board seat

By Laurie McNicholas

Henry Ivanoff of Unalakleet has declined a seat on the board of directors of Siu Alaska Corp., a wholly owned, for-profit subsidiary of Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., according to NSEDC Board Chairman and President Dan Harrelson of White Mountain.

The NSEDC board elected Ivanoff to an NSEDC-affiliated seat on the Siu board by a vote of 7 to 6 over Harrelson, the incumbent, at a meeting Nov. 6 in Unalakleet. Ivanoff is a former NSEDC board chairman who currently serves as an at-large member of the board's finance committee. The Nome Nugget asked Harrelson by e-mail how the NSEDC board plans to fill the seat.

"I anticipate the full NSEDC Board of Directors will hold another election to fill the vacancy," Harrelson replied by e-mail Nov. 13. "We do plan on having a meeting the first week of December to review and approve budgets. My guess is that would be the earliest we can select someone for the vacancy."

eligible voting area.

The City of Nome reported the following vote tally and the percentage of 737 total votes counted for Nome board seat candidates. Steve Brock, 31 (4.2 percent); Tim Smith, 275 (37.3 percent); Don Stiles, 298 (40.43 percent); Robin Thomas, 113 (15.3 percent); and write-in candidates, 20 (2.71 percent).

Election results challenged

On Oct. 30, Smith sent an affidavit contesting the election results to NSEDC officials Dan Harrelson, board chairman and president; Janis Ivanoff, chief executive officer; and Kathy Wheelahan, community outreach coordinator.

Smith said he is challenging the election results because NSEDC bylaws state: "a runoff election shall be held if no candidate receives over 40 percent of the votes cast for member representative." Smith said no candidate received over 40 percent of the 746 votes cast. As noted above, the City of Nome reported that 746 ballots were cast in the NSEDC election for the Nome representative.

"This contest is timely pursuant to 7.25.130 of the Nome Code in that the election has not been canvassed by the Nome Common Council or certified by the NSEDC board of directors," Smith stated in his affidavit.

On Nov. 1 Smith e-mailed a complaint alleging that NSEDC staff had tampered in the Oct. 6 NSEDC election to Harrelson; Ivanoff; Wheelahan; Simon Kinneen, NSEDC's chief operating officer; and Joe Garnie, Teller's board member. Smith requested that the NSEDC board of directors take action on the complaint at their meeting scheduled Nov. 3-6 in Unalakleet.

"NSEDC staff acted inappropriately during the campaign for the October 6, 2009 NSEDC member representative election," Smith stated in the complaint. "These actions appeared to be intended to influence voters and the election outcome.

"I am requesting the following," he continued: "1. Investigate this matter. 2. Reprimand the staff members involved. 3. Establish written policies for staff to follow in the future. 4. Establish in writing, actions for future violations.

"It is important that this complaint be addressed before the Nome runoff election in December," Smith's complaint concluded.

Smith's affidavit of Oct. 30 and his complaint of Nov. 1 were not discussed by the NSEDC board of directors during any public session at their meetings Nov. 3-6 in Unalakleet, according to a reporter for The Nome Nugget who attended the meeting. The reporter said the board did not take action to certify election results for the Oct. 6 member representative elections in a public session at the meeting. Several times during the four-day meeting, Janis Ivanoff announced the winners of five elections for NSEDC board seats, each time identifying Don Stiles as the winner of the Nome election. Stiles was sworn in as Nome's member representative Nov. 6 during the annual NSEDC directors' meeting.

Complaint filed in court

The complaint Smith filed in the Superior Court Monday states that the election of Stiles was improper in the following respects:

"(A) The election was not consistent with the decision of the Alaska Superior Court in Smith v. Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation, 2NO-94-141CI, which, among other things, required NSEDC Board elections to be conducted under City of Nome election rules.

"(B) Voters not eligible to vote in municipal elections because they did not reside in the municipal boundaries were allowed to vote.

"(C) Changes to the Nome voting rules need to be made by the City of Nome, and not the Board of NSEDC. Any changes made to those voting rules by the Board of NSEDC and applied in this election are not valid.

"(D) The required plurality requirement in this election (50 percent plus 1) prescribed by the Nome voting rules was not applied in this election.

"(E) A plurality requirement of 40 percent, adopted by the NSEDC was not met in this case in any event.

"(F) The CDQ enabling legislation, 16 U.S.C. 1855 (the Magnuson-Stevens Act) requires that a director be selected from each village, including Nome. The provisions of this Act were violated by allowing participation in the process by voters and candidates from outside of Nome.

"(G) The voting was improperly influenced by the CEO of NSEDC calling Nome voters on the election day to influence their votes."

Smith requests the following relief in his complaint against NSEDC.

"1. A declaration that the election and seating of Don Stiles as a Board member of NSEDC was void, and that this seat be vacated.

"2. An order directing that a runoff election between Don Stiles and Timothy E. Smith be held, to be conducted in accord with the decision of the Court in Smith v. Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation.

"3. An award of costs and attorney fees, and

"4. An award of such and further relief as this Court may deem just and proper."

On Monday a Superior Court summons was issued to NSEDC that requires the company to file with the court a written answer to Smith's complaint within 20 days after receiving the summons.

In response to a request for comments about his Superior Court complaint, Smith emailed the following statement to the Nugget.

"Third world countries have honey buckets and crooked elections and they are full of the same thing.

"We trusted NSEDC in 1994 when they agreed to hold fair elections and they have repeatedly betrayed our trust."

— Tim Smith

The people in power manipulate elections to keep themselves in power and keep everyone else living in third world conditions. We trusted NSEDC in 1994 when they agreed to hold fair elections and they have repeatedly betrayed our trust.

"In the 2003 election for Nome director, they packed the ballot box with votes from ineligible voters and Don Stiles got in by two votes. In 2006, Don wasn't even on the ballot when we held our election but somehow he ended up on the NSEDC board anyway. This year, the paper carried color pictures of Don passing over giant checks from Siu worth $426,500, right before the election. Siu exists for one purpose, and that is to provide dividends to NSEDC. It is not authorized to donate money to anybody except NSEDC. It's obvious from the timing and the grandiose way it was done that the intent was to buy votes for Don.

"The CDQ program is a great program. If it was run the way it is supposed to be run, it could do a lot to help get our people out of third-world living conditions. I'm disgusted with these constant efforts by the people in control, using our money, to lock us out."

SPORTS

Wrestlers get a sneak peak at state competition

Five Nome wrestlers worked their way to the upper echelons of last weekend's ACS Wrestling Tournament in Anchorage.

The massive tournament is widely considered a preview of the upcoming state meet as most schools of all sizes compete at ACS. As a team, Nome worked its way to eighth place among the 33 in its class.

Individually, Lonny Booshu placed highest for the Nanooks, earning second place at 125 lbs. Gabe Cabrera placed third for his weight class, Eric Odden placed fourth, David Stickel was sixth and Derek Weiler placed sixth, as well.

The wrestlers will travel to Bethel this weekend before defending its home mats at the Northern Conference Tournament Dec. 4-5. The tournament will decide who moves on to state.

Nome's gym will see some action this weekend, as well, as the junior high squad hosts Bethel Friday and Saturday.

support the proposal, warned that the later hunt could likely result in a glut of unsuccessful hunters from other units putting more pressure on the area in question. With road access to Council from Nome and river access from Council to White Mountain, there is plenty of access to the area from the region's population center.

Gorn also noted that the bulls are much more susceptible later in September as they enter the rut. "Although the initial idea was to provide more hunting opportunity for residents of White Mountain and Golovin, I think there is a real potential of unsuccessful hunters from Nome driving down to Council to hunt this area when moose are up and moving around. I think the impact of that might actually take more opportunity away from the villages of White Mountain and Golovin," Gorn said.

"The later season is really a choice time for a moose hunter," Judkins said. "I think it would really increase the harvest there and load everybody up in one area."

• Guide requirements for 22B shot down: The board unanimously denied a proposal that would have required guide-client agreements for nonresident moose hunters at the time they applied for a permit in the eastern part of Unit 22B. The proposal was submitted by area guide Bob Hannon. In the section of the proposal form that asks what will happen if the proposal is not implemented, Hannon answered, "Out of state unprepared guides and outfitters will continue to waste moose meat as has happened in the past."

The board was leery to take up the issue when guides are not required for nonresident moose hunts. "We require guides for nonresidents for bear, sheep, goats, but for moose, you're not required to have a guide," Grussendorf said. "But to apply it here, and looking at statutory language, I'm wondering if we could do that?"

"Every time we start getting into the guide business, it seems like we stumble," Bell said. "I think Ben [Grussendorf] makes a good point. There's a reasonable chance we can't do, and I think there's a good reason for us not to do it."

Kevin Saxby, a state assistant attorney general advising the board on legal issues, said as he understood the proposal, it was not requiring a guide for the hunt, but addressing nonresident hunters if a guide was to be involved. He added that if the proposal was indeed requiring a guide, it would run contrary to Alaska statute.

"Seems like we're getting the cart before the horse. If the guy gets the permit, then he can decide if he wants the guide afterward," Bradley said.

• All bear proposals fail: Proposals to extend the brown bear season in Units 22A and 22C failed by a 0-7 vote. Likewise, a proposal to shorten the season and reduce the brown bear bag limit in the Bering Land Bridge National Preserve failed to garner any board support.

Assistant wildlife biologist Letty Hughes for Unit 22 said the department did not support any of the bear proposals. For the Unit 22A proposal, concerning the area around St. Michael, she noted that the department believed the extended dates would increase the bear harvest rates rapidly. The proposal would have stretched the season to June 15. It currently runs Aug. 1 to May 31.

Hughes reported that unit-wide, annual brown bear harvests have nearly doubled since a liberalization in regulations in 1997. Before the regulation shift, she said an average of 55 bears were harvested each year. The average is now 93, she said.

"I can't support it because in the last 10 years, it's at least doubled, the take of brown bears," Bradley said. "Providing more opportunity is going to increase that, so I support the department's view."

"I agree with Lew [Bradley] on this one," Spraker said. "This looks like a recipe for over-harvest."

In Unit 22C, Hughes said the issue is not so much a concern for the bear population, but in where people will be hunting. "Our concern isn't that 22C can't withstand a modest increase. Our concern is a reduction in harvest in 22B where we have documented chronically low moose-calf recruitments."

The board agreed with the department's view.

The proposal to alter the brown bear regulations in the national preserve met the same fate. Hughes reported that since 1997 the average harvest of bears in the Bering Land Bridge National Preserve has gone from three to five.

Board members cited the low harvest numbers, a desire for consistency in regulations on and off the preserve and a legal opinion from the Department of Law that they are not in violation of any federal law by leaving the regulation as is in their vote to deny the proposal.

• Wolverine season unchanged:

A proposal by Brian Simpson to extend the wolverine season in several parts of Unit 22 to April 30 for both trapping and hunting received a unanimous thumbs-down from the board. The hunting season currently ends March 31 while the trapping season concludes April 15. Simpson argued that winter conditions last longer in the northern and western portions of the unit, making a later season a reasonable request.

The department recommended the board deny the proposal. Nome trapper Culley also spoke out against the proposal in his testimony. An avid trapper, Culley said he pulls his wolverine traps a few weeks before the season's end to avoid taking females.

Hughes said the department did not have good numbers on the wolverine population, but said low harvest numbers generally signify small populations.

• Wolf season reduction fails:

Opposed by the department, the northern and southern Norton Sound Advisory Committees and several people testifying, a proposal to reduce the wolf hunting season in Unit 22 and cut the bag limit in half was quickly shot down by the board.

"My notes from public testimony show we had several people testify in opposition to this," Spraker said. "There's no need to reduce the season by 120 days. The harvest of wolves falls in acceptable levels."

The proposal would have started the season on Nov. 1 and closed it March 31. The bag limit would have been cut from 20 to 10 wolves. The season currently runs from Aug. 1 to April 30.

MEETING WITH FUTURE POLITICIANS—Sen. Lisa Murkowski sits with the first grade math group on Nov. 13 at the Nome Elementary School.

Sen. Murkowski enlists local support as mail crisis looms

By Tyler Rhodes

U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski wants you to write her an e-mail.

In the face of a looming budget crisis at the U.S. Postal Service, the senator warned Nomeites during a visit last week that the mechanism by which nearly all retail goods arrive in rural Alaska is at risk. “Our reality is the postal service is about $8 billion in the hole. It is a mess,” she said during a public question-and-answer session at Old St. Joe’s Hall Nov. 13.

Murkowski said that reality means bypass mail will likely be in the crosshairs as the Postal Service scrambles to fill the ever-widening chasm in its budget. Bypass mail, so named because it is shipped directly from the sender to the recipient without going through the post office, is a lifeline to much of rural Alaska in keeping consumer costs low. Under the system, shippers are charged the parcel postage rate, one of the lowest offered by the postal service.

For policymakers to understand just why the system that ensures cheaper freight rates in Alaska should remain, Murkowski asked for residents to send her e-mails relating the cost of shopping for essential goods in their community versus going to large box stores in Anchorage and Outside.

While there may be a bit of irony in the senator’s request—the Postal Service has cited the shift to electronic communication as a large contributor to plummeting revenues—the intent is to provide ammunition for the argument that bypass mail needs to remain intact for rural Alaskans. “We’ve got to better lay the case as to why this is essential,” she said.

“My great concern is bypass mail becomes a victim of the U.S. Postal Service’s near insolvency,” Murkowski said. “Most people do not understand it...so it is ripe for attack.”

Murkowski, along with Sen. Mark Begich and Rep. Don Young, helped broker a deal in March that thwarted a significant rate increase for the bypass mail service. The congressional intervention helped hold the rate increase in a range of 12-17 percent instead of the 40 percent jump that loomed.

Murkowski said a range of options are being considered to help the Postal Service save money, including reducing the number of service days per week to five. “Everything is on the table right now,” she said.

Murkowski said rural residents should send her e-mails detailing the costs of a grocery shopping trip at home versus in the city. “Don’t forget to add in what it costs you to go get it,” she said, referring to fuel costs for travel. A link to e-mail the senator can be found at her website at murkowski.senate.gov.

The mail was just one subject the senator covered in her half-day visit to Nome. The public meeting came following her visit to the Norton Sound Regional Hospital and the elementary and junior/senior high schools. At the public session, Murkowski fielded questions that covered everything from the U.S. military’s role in Afghanistan to subsistence priorities in Alaska.

Health care

With so much of the national attention focused on health care reform, Dr. Bob Lawrence, who recently opened a private practice in Nome, asked Murkowski what was being done at the national level to encourage more doctors to provide primary care.

“We’ve got a real crisis when it comes to providers,” she said, noting only 13 doctors in Anchorage are currently accepting new Medicare patients. She noted that current policy does not provide incentive for new doctors to go into the primary care field, which often means longer working hours and less pay than for a specialty doctor. “We can’t have everybody be the specialist,” she said.

She suggested ideas like loan forgiveness for new doctors providing specialty care or tax incentives for established primary care doctors to provide care in underserved areas, like rural Alaska. She said tweaking the current health care system to provide more Americans with medical coverage will do little good if there are no doctors available for them to see. “We’re focused on giving everyone the card, but failing in providing the service once everybody is issued the card,” she said.

Nome resident Jake Kenick asked the senator whether Alaskans medically covered by the Indian Health Service will need to move over to any public health care coverage if such an option is established. “We’re making sure the IHS piece will not be disturbed,” she replied. “We’ve worked to make sure that what we have within IHS is separate from health care reform.”

Broad range of issues

Other questions posed at the forum covered the effort by rural schools to meet the requirements of the No Child Left Behind Act, the possibility of a Coast Guard installation in Nome and the potential for natural gas development in the region.

Joel Alowa, who has worked with Nome Public Schools through his job at Nome Eskimo Community, told Murkowski that Nome’s schools have chronically failed to meet the yearly benchmarks set by the No Child Left Behind Act. The senator said she believes there is a problem between the idea and application of the federal legislation.

“We shouldn’t be afraid of accountability,” she told the audience. “We should be afraid of a nationalized approach.” She highlighted the difficulties in having teachers in rural schools who are required to meet the federal standard of being “highly qualified” for every subject they teach. Rural teachers often must cover many subjects due to the small size of the school or frequent turnover.

Murkowski said she advocated for flexibility in the legislation as it is revamped while still maintaining the accountability aspect.

In terms of a Coast Guard presence in Nome, Murkowski said she is aware that the military is working to gain a stronger foothold in the Arctic. She said she could not be certain as to what the physical layout of that increased presence will be. Murkowski said she was concerned

Unalakleet Schools project includes gym

By Laurie McNicholas

“I know it will make a huge difference,” Luci Ivanoff said of the new and enlarged gym currently under construction at Unalakleet Schools. “We’ve wanted a bigger gym for a long time. It was all we had, but the way it was set up, you had to come to a game early to position yourself not to sit behind a pole and crane your neck.”

Ivanoff, who is the schools’ librarian, explained that three large poles extending from the gym’s floor to its ceiling in front of the bleachers obstructed views. She made the widest circle the length of her arms would allow to indicate the circumference of the poles. Sometimes fans whose views were blocked by the poles would give up efforts to watch game action and visit with each other, she added. She said cushioned chairs from the library were placed in front of the bleachers and on the sidelines for elders.

The gym is used for community events in addition to students’ competitive games. “In the six years I’ve been here, all kinds of things have been done in the gym—funerals, graduations, Christmas concerts,” said Unalakleet Schools Principal Ben Howard.

The new gym is part of a major maintenance construction project funded at approximately $12.5 million by the Alaska Legislature, Howard explained. He said the project allows the school to change its design, but not its square footage. Construction began last May, will continue through the winter and is scheduled for completion in August 2010, he added.

The project includes extensive redesign and construction of the middle school and high school areas in addition to the gym, along with a new roof for the entire structure, including the elementary school. The elementary school is a newer section of the structure than other areas, Howard noted. He said construction began last May, will continue through the winter and is scheduled for completion in August 2010.

The K-12 school is internally divided into Unalakleet Elementary, Unalakleet Middle School, and Frank A. Degnan High School. The combined school population of Unalakleet Schools is 185 students from Early Childhood Education through 12th grade, Howard said.

FUNDRAISER

- Chili Dinner/Auction
- November 28
- 6 p.m.
- Old St. Joseph Hall

Hats off to Mike Owens. Thank you for your dedication to the Norton Sound Region. You have touched the lives of most of us at some point throughout your 26 years in Nome. We are fortunate to have dedicated people like you serving the community. Thank You Mike!

Mike Owens’ family in Florida has recently endured several family tragedies in a very short time. Mike’s uncle passed away at the beginning of summer. Mike’s father had emergency cardiac vascular surgery from which he is still recovering. Soon after, his brother suffered a near fatal heart attack. He spent several weeks in ICU and has yet to recover. The latest blow was Mike’s father being diagnosed with liver cancer. He is currently undergoing treatment in Tampa, Florida with Mike at his side.

Mike has spent the summer in Florida taking care of his parents while Pat has handled everything here in Nome. They need support of the community that they so faithfully served for a quarter of a century.

Friends and family have organized this chili dinner and auction at Old St. Joseph Hall on November 28 at 6 p.m.

A web of inquiries at work bogs you down but is a blessing in disguise.	ARIES March 21–April 19	Face it, Aries. You’re your own worst critic. You expect a lot from yourself and others. Not everyone can measure up to your standards, though. Accept their apology and move on. You have bigger fish to fry.	LEO July 23–August 22	Wait no more, Leo. You’ve given a mentor ample time to consider your proposal. Stop bugging them about it and go on without them. You can do it alone.	SCORPIO October 23–November 21	A breach of confidence makes waves at work. You may be privy to the matter, but that doesn’t mean you have to add fuel to the fire, Scorpio. Leave it be.

“Thanksgiving Thanks”
“Thanks be to God for his indescribable gift!”
- II Corinthians 9:15

As we prepare to celebrate the Thanksgiving holiday it is my prayer that we will take the time to consider all the things we have to be thankful for in our lives. We have friends and family who love us and are there for us when we need help or are facing difficult situations. We live in a beautiful place. We are blessed to be able to walk out our front doors and see the amazing land and seascape the Lord has created around us. The simplicity of living here in Nome is a true blessing. While many experience the hustle and bustle of city life, we have the privilege of being able to live in a place where we can (for the most part), walk the streets without fear of being mugged or run over by the traffic that jams many of our nation’s cities. We have the wonderful opportunity to really get to know our neighbors, unlike those who live in larger communities or cities, where they would rather just be left alone to live out their lives without ever truly knowing who lives next door to them. Folks, we are truly a blessed people here in Nome.

In addition to all this, we have something even more wonderful to be thankful for this holiday season. We have the opportunity to show our appreciation to the One who has made all this possible: the Lord Jesus Christ! Without Jesus, we would not have the privilege of knowing what true beauty there is in the creation He has surrounded us with each day. We would not be able to truly experience the love our heavenly Father has for us if it were not for the presence of his son in our lives. When Jesus came into to the world, he came to bring us the most precious gift we could ever receive from someone. He came to bring us “salvation” from our sins. The love of God caused him to send his son to provide a way for us to come back to him. Jesus provides for us, the opportunity to be forgiven and restored to the relationship we once had with God, “in the beginning...” It says in John 3:16 that; “God so loved the world (you & I), that he sent his only son (Jesus), into the world, that whoever would believe in him, (accept him as their savior) would not perish, but would have eternal life!” What a gift!

So, as we gather around the table this Thanksgiving, let us truly take time to give thanks for the greatest gift we have or will ever receive: Salvation and eternal Life through Jesus Christ! As we partake of the food that God has blessed us with, may we also partake of the opportunity he has given us: the opportunity to be restored in our relationship to God, through his Son, Jesus Christ. May we truly “count our blessings” as we celebrate all that God has given us this holiday season.

Have a blessed Thanksgiving!

that the Coast Guard can often be overshadowed by the other military branches in seeking funding. She also lamented the limited number of ice-breakers the military possessed, which proves a hindrance to further Arctic exploration.

In response to a question from Tim Smith regarding natural gas exploration offshore in the area, Murkowski responded that such work would be more the purview of private industry than the federal government. “If we can’t get private industry to pursue it, why would the federal government go out? That’s not our business,” she said.

She did note that state and federal regulations can make it difficult for private industry to pursue exploration. She also mentioned the potential of renewable resource development in rural Alaska, such as tapping into wind or geothermal resources. She noted that local leaders need to be the ones banging the drum to get support for projects in their region. “We’ve got potential if we’re willing to push it a little further,” she said.

Cold Therapy: The Healing Effects of Frozen Peas

Bob Lawrence, MD
Alaska Family Doctor
Physicians in early Egypt, and later the Aesclepien doctors of ancient Greece, recognized the anti-inflammatory and analgesic qualities of cold therapy in their writings. And while patients today have access to a plethora of over-the-counter and prescription strength remedies for common musculo-skeletal injuries, nothing has proven to be as broadly useful or universally appealing as a simple bag of ice.

Ice can be used to reduce pain and speed recovery in a wide range of ailments including: sprained joints; tendonitis; arthritis; migraine headaches; and neuralgias. Ice or similar forms of cold therapy are the most commonly used first aid treatment in acute sport’s injuries.

Cold therapy improves recovery after an injury first by reducing blood flow to an injured area. This slowing of blood flow, called vasoconstriction, decreases swelling and slows the migration of destructive inflammatory cells into injured tissues. A study published in 1989 showed that cold therapy used to treat serious ankle sprains reduced recovery-time from 30 days to 13 days.

Furthermore, cold therapy reduces muscle spasm and slows the firing of nerve endings leading to a reduction in perceived pain.

Cold packs have become increasingly sophisticated, but there is no evidence to suggest that expensive ice-packs or gel-packs are better than a plastic bag filled with snow or crushed ice. In fact, one researcher found that in order to lower the skin temperature to a therapeutic level, a bag of frozen peas was more effective than commercially available frozen gel packs.

Ice massage is also very effective for ailments like tendonitis and muscle spasms. Ice massage is performed with a frozen paper cup of ice massaged over a site of pain using overlapping strokes. Similarly, a frozen bottle of water can be rolled under the foot to soothe and stretch the tendons in a plantar fasciitis. A bath of ice water is a good treatment for injured extremities.

In general, injuries should be treated with cold therapy for no more than 20 minutes repeated as needed every one to two hours. Longer exposure to cold can cause permanent nerve or tissue damage.

When using ice packs, a thin cloth should be placed between the ice-pack and skin to prevent frostbite.

Cold therapy is not recommended for patients with Reynaud’s syndrome, uncontrolled thyroid problems, poorly controlled blood pressure, or other sensitivity to cold exposure.

Cold therapy should never be used on an extremity that has a loss of protective sensation like in an advanced diabetic neuropathy or nerve compression syndrome. Caution should also be used in people with peripheral vascular disease.

Talk to your provider or physical therapist about the most effective use of ice to treat your injury or ailment. You may also want keep a bag of peas in the freezer; just in case.

The school inherited the old gym from a U.S. Air Force squadron that was once based in the community. "The gym of the Air Force base was hauled down and attached to the school in the mid-1970s," Howard said. "Folks who were here in the '50s and late '40s remember re-designing the high school. "[Construction workers] tore down the old gym to its foundations." In early November Howard showed a reporter from The Nome Nugget the new gym—a spacious room with a high ceiling and an unfinished interior.

Howard has served as principal for four years, and for the prior two years as assistant principal. He has held teaching and administrative positions in the Bering Strait School District for 15 years.

He expressed gratitude to the State of Alaska and the late Richard Foster, who represented Alaska House District 39, for assistance in funding the construction project. He said the project contractor SKW Construction is good to work with. "They've given tours to teachers, the advisory board and school council," he added.

NOME JOINT UTILITY SYSTEM

The Utility received additional fuel for power generation on the fall barge and the average inventory price per gallon has been recomputed.

Additionally, the Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation's Board of Directors voted to allow NJUS to participate in the NSEDC Fuel Program relative to the recent purchase. Under the program, NSEDC is providing the financing for the recent delivery at ZERO interest, saving NJUS in excess of $70,000 it would otherwise pay for commercial financing.

As a result of the above items, in accordance with NJUS Tariff, Schedule D, the fuel surcharge has been recomputed. The Nome Joint Utility Board voted to implement a new surcharge rate effective immediately.

For billings issued after November 10, the new surcharge rate is 16.98 cents per kilowatt hour, a reduction of 1.03 cents from the current rate of 18.01 cents.

On behalf of the residents of the community, the Nome Joint Utility Board expresses its appreciation to the Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation Board and Staff for allowing NJUS to participate in the fuel program, and the Board is pleased to be able to pass the resulting benefit on to all customers in the community.

NSEDC loan, cheaper fuel to knock a few bucks off utility bills

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Joint Utility System was able to avoid paying 5 percent to 6 percent interest on a bank loan when the local community development quota fishing group agreed to let the utility into Norton Sound Economic Development Corp.'s village bulk fuel program.

The approximate reduction of $7 to $8 a month—the price of a gallon of milk in Nome—will begin with the bills hitting the mailboxes at the end of this month and affect all customers, commercial and residential.

NJUS will pay for fuel with a 12-month, interest-free loan of $2.4 million with no fees to finance purchase of 1 million gallons of fuel this fall. The NSEDC board approved the loan of nearly $2.5 million in early November. NJUS approved the move at its Nov. 10 board meeting.

That stroke of fortune and a load of cheaper fuel this fall translates to a penny off the customer's fuel surcharge on electric bills. The fuel surcharge has dropped from 18.01 cents to 16.98 cents, John K. Handeland, NJUS's manager said Monday.

"The average value of inventory on hand dropped by 25 cents per gallon after the last barge delivery," Handeland said. Based on the number of kilowatts produced by a gallon and the reduction going through a consistent formula yields the saving.

Because NJUS has for some years belonged to the Western Alaska Fuel Group, a diesel fuel-buying consortium, the utility has not participated in the Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. program.

NJUS contacted Wells Fargo Bank for financing as they have done for the past 20 years, which Wells Fargo would provide—but the NJUS board of directors was not pleased with their initial verbal price quote in which the interest would fall between 5 percent to 6 percent ($80,000 to $90,000 based on the initial estimate of a loan of $2.7 million).

Based on the actual cost affect on inventory when the fall 1.06 million gallons was loaded, which was down in price, the necessary loan came to $2.2 million that would cost $70,000 to $80,000 in interest per Wells Fargo's terms. The NJUS board asked Handeland to knock at NSEDC's fuel financing window to see whether NJUS could qualify for their village bulk fuel program.

Handeland said the transaction with NSEDC had the potential to open the door for future work with NSEDC to significantly improve the utility's bulk purchasing power.

"We look forward to exploring the possibility of NJUS participating in our bulk fuel program in the future," NSEDC's chief executive officer, Janis Ivanoff, said via e-mail.

from throughout District 39. Largely made up of residents of Nome and Unalakleet, the committee forwarded the names of Sam Towarak Sr., Ralph "Weaver" Ivanoff and Foster to the governor Oct. 29.

Political observers from around the state had debated whether Foster would align with the minority Democrats or caucus with the Republicans—as his father and a handful of other rural Democratic House members have done. The House Democrats had made it clear to the District 39 selection committee, however, that they would not seat someone who would not pledge to caucus with them. The selection committee, in turn, informed the candidates.

During his interview before the committee in Nome Oct. 28, Foster said he was aware of the need to caucus with the Democrats in order to be confirmed. Additionally, he said he would align himself with the minority due to his political philosophy. "This is the Democratic party," he said at the time. "I've always been a Democrat. I've been registered [with the party] since I was 18."

The extra member in the minority affords the Democrats another seat on the powerful House Finance Committee. Just who in the caucus will get that seat was not yet announced as of press time Tuesday. Aided by powerful committee assignments, the elder Foster was able to steer funding to his district. Neal Foster said he is hopeful he can keep the resources devoted to District 39 at their current level.

Following his swearing in Foster said his first task will be to contact each community in the district to establish a line of communication with leaders throughout the region. A large focus of the interview process by the selection committee in Nome was how to better represent the southern end of the district, which stretches all the way to Chevak.

Foster also said he plans to focus on resource development and jobs in the region, and to work to combat social issues like physical and sexual abuse, and suicide. He also noted a desire to deliver renewable energy projects to villages, citing his experience with Banner Wind, which placed 18 turbines in Nome.

Foster's seat will be up for election next fall. He indicated after his selection by the governor that he would be filing paperwork as soon as possible to run.

cold to keep the snow coming without expected rain taking the stage as originally forecast.

For the first half of the month, the Nome area had the 10th snowiest November on record with 13.1 inches so far. In 1915, snow set a record with 31.5 inches coming down during the first half of November.

High water pushed west from the Bering Sea into Norton Sound bypassed western villages and piled up in the Unalakleet-Saint Michael area, according to Steiger.

Seawater came into the yards of half a dozen homes, but didn't flood the dwellings, he said.

Slushy ice collected as it rode toward shore and tempered the waves in Nome and Norton Sound, preventing damage.

"Slush ice moving in during a storm is protective and usually very helpful for the most part in dampening the high seas," Steiger explained.

Steve Ivanoff, Kawerak Inc.'s transportation planner in Unalakleet, said ice was a friend where village residents vacated some homes, just in case. "It started out worse than any other storm here until the slush came in and softened the waves. I had people and a loader buffering my home to divert the water around our house," Ivanoff said via e-mail Nov. 12. "Without the slush, we would have been in a world of hurt."

"What was interesting was the stars weren't aligned for a flood—high tide prediction was low and 12 hours away. We had about 20 homes evacuated into several buildings and homes. We even had pizza delivered free to the clinic where there were a lot of people staying," Ivanoff added. He said his office wouldn't be able to determine the full damage until the spring breakup of ice and snow.

Folks at Teller Clinic and Teller Traditional Council said the storm had not caused flooding.

Nome waters registered at 5.5 feet high water, combining the storm surge and the tides. "If the water comes up to six feet, we start worrying about Belmont Point," Steiger said. "Eight to 10 feet and we worry about downtown Nome."

Fire victim's family sues AMI

By Diana Haecker

The family of Jeff Martin, who perished in a house fire in Nome in October 2007, filed a lawsuit against his employer, Alaska Mechanical Inc., for negligence and punitive damages in excess of $100,000.

Martin was a worker for AMI constructing the Rock Creek gold mine. As he was not from Nome, the company arranged for housing for him and others. According to the complaint filed in Nome Superior Court Oct. 29, AMI provided Martin with improper housing as the house lacked adequate exits, fire prevention devices and was improperly sealed.

Martin was a victim of a blaze that broke out in the garage, where children had been playing with fire. The fire spread into the single-story home and quickly engulfed the entire house. Two other occupants managed to escape the blaze, but Martin was trapped inside and died in the fire. The lawsuit was filed by Fairbanks lawyer Jason Weiner on behalf of Vicki Martin. The parties declined to comment.

Settlement nears in clergy sex abuse case

By Diana Haecker

After negotiations leading up to a hearing last week at the federal bankruptcy court in Anchorage, nearly 300 victims of clergy sex abuse agreed to the third amended bankruptcy plan proposed by the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska.

The plan would guarantee that the victims receive $10 million in settlement payments.

Provided that the bankruptcy judge approves the consensual plan, payments to the sexual abuse survivors can be made as early as this Christmas or early 2010, said CBNA legal coordinator Ronnie Rosenberg.

Over the past six years, men and women mostly from villages in northwestern Alaska came forward with claims of having suffered sexual abuse as children at the hands of Catholic priests and lay workers. Some cases date back to the 1950s through the 1980s. Nome priest and KNOM radio station founder James

Taxes, barking dogs and other issues highlight council's Nov. 23 work session

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Common Council collected in their chamber Nov. 23 for a cathartic work session on issues near and dear to them and several sectors of Nome residents.

No official action can be taken during work sessions, so these topics likely will come up at the next regular Council meeting Dec. 14: animal control ordinance, landfill operations, snowmobile and ATV traffic ordinance, snow removal ordinance, resale certificates and legislative priorities.

Off the bat, businesses holding resale certificates may get the once-over to see if they are fudging. A resale certificate allows tax-free purchases that will be sold again unaltered. The store's customers will pay the tax. Councilman Stan Andersen suspects some goods are being changed and

A cold and busy start

Cold-weather emergency shelter sees brisk business with colder than normal November

By Tyler Rhodes

Only a dozen days after its initial opening for the winter season, Nome's emergency cold-weather shelter had already seen nine nights of business by Nov. 28.

That meant nine nights where up to 13 of Nome's residents and visitors without adequate housing were able to sleep in a warm space, get a little hot food and not have to worry about the dangers of exposure to the extreme cold. It also meant 36 shifts that the all-volunteer Nome Emergency Shelter Team had to ensure were covered so that the makeshift accommodations could be provided.

With each night of operation requiring four shifts to be manned at the shelter, NEST organ-

Letters

Hey,
I am sitting here, nice and cozy, on this beautifully cold day trying to get a hold of an open line.
I would like to remind people that it is voting time for our corporations. Your vote counts! Wouldn't you rather see someone you think would be good for your community be in office? In order to do that, then you'd have to vote for that person and hope they win—providing their name is on the ballot. But, in order for you to vote, your corporation needs to have your correct address. If you're getting a dividend from them, they need the right address for you to get it.
Remember too—because it is much colder out—you need to dress accordingly. Your body is not made to withstand temperatures that we have now, be nice to it and dress accordingly. We will always have another summer where we won't need as much clothes. Oh, and if you see someone that needs gloves or something, and you have extra, may as well make that person happy and donate it.

It is really something when it comes to thinking about Sarah Palin. I wouldn't be all that shocked, I guess, to see her in a different office, because it's the par for the political world. People are dumb enough to fall for it. Yet, she could not even finish her term in this office, doesn't that say something? We need a woman in office—just not that woman.
May you all have some good holidays. May God bless and keep you all. Remember always — the things that count the most are people and their feelings.
Love and miss you all! Take care.
As always,
Karen Nanouk

Editorial

That's the Spirit

One of the many things that make Nome such a great community is our spirit of volunteerism. We have a top-notch fire department with men and women who are ready to turn out in emergencies at all hours of the day and night. We have search and rescue volunteers who head into adversity to help their fellow Nomeites. We have ambulance personnel who come to our rescue in medical emergencies. The remarkable thing about our Nome volunteers is the degree of professionalism and training they put into their work. They are second to none.
We are also fortunate to have a wide range of service organizations in town. These are the folks who provide the social polish and livability for our town. They help to make Nome the fun, artistic, sophisticated (even our bush rats can sing and dance) non-duct tape dependent town we all know and love.
This week we have a chance to show our support to all of our volunteer organizations and have fun while we do it. It's time for the social event of the year—the annual Firemen's Carnival. Go this Saturday. Spend money, have a blast and know that it is money well spent for a good cause—our community.

BP reports oil spill on North Slope

The Associated Press reports that an oil spill near Prudhoe Bay has contaminated about 8,400 square feet of snow-covered tundra on Sunday. The spill occurred on a BP Exploration oil field and it is not clear how much spilled and what caused it. The accident occurred around an 18-pipeline that carried a mixture of crude oil, produced water and natural gas, but the line was not in operation at the time.

Two plead guilty in Point Hope caribou slaughter case

Two of the eight men accused of killing caribou and wasting the edible meat pleaded guilty to wanton waste last week. As part of their plea deal, Randy Oktollik, 27, and Brett Oktollik, 21, are to perform community service working with elders and explaining to young children the right way to harvest meat. They must also pay $1,360 in fines and restitution.

The charges stem from last year when wildlife troopers followed a tip and found 37 dead caribou, among them nursing females, littering the tundra near Point Hope. Special prosecutor and deputy attorney general Rick Svobodny said that from the start, this case has been focused solely on the violation of state laws regarding wanton waste. In a statement he said that the department is pleased with this development, including the component of the sentence requiring the defendants not only to pay a fine and restitution but also to educate the community on the law and Native subsistence traditions. "We are hopeful that others also will accept responsibility for their actions.

If they don't, then we will proceed to trial," Svobodny said.

Juvenile arrested in bomb threat

A 16-year-old student of Anchorage's West High School was arrested at his home on Sunday, when his father discovered explosive devices in the son's backpack. APD's Explosives and Ordinance Disposal Team was called to the scene, secured the bombs and found that the two pipe bombs and an improvised grenade were viable explosive devices. The student was charged with misconduct involving weapons. Investigators found out that the student had the explosive devices on school grounds. Anchorage School District officials conducted locker searches and interviewed other involved students. Superintendent Carol Comeau said other students have been placed on emergency suspension.

missioner, Joe Masters, the public safety commissioner, Leo von Scheben, the transportation commissioner, and John Moller, Governor Parnell's rural advisor went this time to the Bristol Bay area. They started in King Salmon, went to Naknek and finished their trip in Dillingham. Previously, Sullivan and other subcabinet members have visited Unalakleet, Nome, Kotzebue, Barrow, Tanana, Ruby and Galena. The subcabinet is expected to make long-term recommendations for improving rural life by late December or early January.

Child killed in car accident

On Thanksgiving, troopers in St. Mary's were called to a tragic vehicle accident that killed a 4-year old girl. According to a trooper release, Arlene Paukan, 32, of St. Mary's, was traveling behind her 4-year-old daughter in a 2005 GMC pickup on the side of the roadway when she inadvertently ran over the child. The child was taken to the St. Mary's Sub-Regional Clinic and died of the injuries. Troopers say, alcohol does not appear to be a factor at this time, but the investigation is ongoing.

Subcabinet on fourth bush trip

Lance Mackey, his dad Dick, inducted in Alaska Hall of Fame

On Monday, the Alaska Sports Hall of Fame announced its Class of 2010. Reigning Iditarod champion and four-time Yukon Quest winner Lance Mackey as well as snowboarder and Olympic medalist Rosey Fletcher, deceased mountaineer Brad Washburn and former NYO star (and now state legislator) Reggie Joule were the four persons inducted in the Alaska Sports Hall of Fame. The Hall of Fame also recognized two moments in Alaska's sport history. One was Lance Mackey's dad Dick's memorable one-second victory in the 1978 Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race. The other moment celebrated by the Hall was Noorvik's Elliot Sampson's upset victory in the 1981 Alaska high school cross-country running meet. The induction ceremony will take place on February 25, 2010 at the ConocoPhillips Atrium in Anchorage.

sold in violation of the code. He wants to get an idea of how much tax the city may be losing, since the practice has for years relied on the honor system.

"We need to get a better handle on it or get out of the business," Andersen said.

Currently, 17 businesses have resale licenses. Eight of these are bars.

The panel did agree that the city's public works should run the Beam Road landfill throughout the winter as they have during October, after rejecting bids from potential operators. The city runs the dump for less than the last contractor, but councilman Gerald Brown brought out that the account did not include equipment nor wear and tear. The facility, formerly open three days a week, will open only on Saturdays.

City crews have instituted a new method of pushing and covering refuse, with the outcome that the number of ravens circulating over the trash and wind blown bags has decreased. Former contract operator Gary Hart said the raven and bag control looked good, but the current operation that does not spread and aerate the refuse would fill the landfill cell faster.

The council put the current animal control ordinance on the table with comment on upping the fines for barking dogs. They have been working with the city's attorney on a punitive response to aggressive dogs.

The increasing number of snowmachines on busy roads caused consternation, with comment that safety requirements should be tightened up and drivers restricted to back roads. A suggestion that owners buy stickers for a fee high enough to pay for the program did not get out of the chute.

Councilman Andersen was tired of having private snow removal crews clear parking lots and the like by pushing the snow into the streets and he was not going to take it. He proposed a rule that private plows should wait until city crews got a fire lane through at least.

The council did not winnow down its state and federal legislative priorities, but established the idea that a new municipal museum should be high on the list.

Concerned citizens might attend the Dec. 14 meeting to see laws introduced that affect pets, landfill availability, safety regulations for snowmachines and mini-trucks, and sidewalk snow removal. While the council seemed to come to no concrete consensus on most beefs at the work session, decisions could come about by osmosis and intuition, but certainly not illegal phone calls and e-mails before the next council meeting.

Woman dies from tub fall

At 12:27 a.m. Thanksgiving Day, Nome police were dispatched to the Polar Arms Apartment where it was reported that a woman was found deceased in one of the rooms.

Nome police and volunteer ambulance personnel were dispatched to the scene where they discovered the body of Melissa Renee Horn, 28, in the bathtub of the room.

According to Nome police Sgt. Byron Redburn, Horn arrived in Nome the previous day with her uncle and was to have started a new job the following Monday at Quyanna Care for Norton Sound Health Corp. She is formerly of Emonak and most recently from St. Michael.

According to Sgt. Redburn, her body was discovered when her uncle returned to the room. Police say she had been drinking and apparently slipped and fell in the tub. Preliminary investigation indicates the cause of death may have been accidental.

The body of Horn was sent to the State Medical Examiner for further investigation into the manner and cause of death.

$4.6 million grant may locate the hot spot at Pilgrim

University of Alaska Fairbanks project would use remote sensing techniques to evaluate geothermal potential at less cost

Coal mine fires, volcanoes and Pilgrim Hot Springs seems like an unusual combination.

But a technique used to study the first two may prove valuable in tracing the heat source of the third. Such is the aim of a University of Alaska Fairbanks study slated to take place at the hot springs just north of Nome with the help of $4.6 million U.S. Department of Energy grant.

"As part of this project the University of Alaska is proposing a new and innovative iterative method of digital processing of acquired thermal infrared data adapted from thermal data processing techniques successfully used to identify small and subtle coal mine fires and in volcanology research," reads a project description from the U.S. Department of Energy.

In short, the Alaska Center for Energy and Power at UAF is proposing to utilize aerial infrared photography to help evaluate the potential of geothermal resources for power projects. The project, which requires a $1 million local match, would back up the aerial research through traditional, ground-based geophysical surveys and drilling, according to a press release from UAF. "While these traditional methods are reliable, the associated costs may not always be economical, preventing exploration in many areas. Remote sensing could offer a less-costly alternative," the release reads.

"We are partnering with our colleagues at the Alaska Volcano Observatory," ACEP director Gwen Holdmann said in the release. "If we can prove this less-expensive technology can provide reliable data, it opens up a new world for geothermal exploration in the state."

The Alaska Center for Energy and Power is seeking the $1 million match from the State of Alaska's Renewable Energy Fund. Holdmann told the Fairbanks Daily Newsminer that the project could get underway next summer if the matching funds are obtained.

The Alaska Center for Energy and Power has teamed with the Catholic Diocese of Fairbanks which owns the property surrounding the hot springs, as well as adjacent landowner Mary's Igloo Native Corp. The location of the main source of hot springs is currently unknown and could actually be on the Mary's Igloo property.

The project comes just as the diocese prepares to put the hot springs property up for sale to fund the settlement of multiple sexual abuse claims. A $10 million settlement has nearly been finalized between the church and attorneys representing claimants (see story on page 1).

This would not be the first time studies have occurred at the hot springs. Work took place at Pilgrim in the late 1970s and early 1980s. Data from those studies would be used in this latest endeavor.

While the project is designed to, in a sense, test a test for geothermal evaluation, the work could also determine that the resource at Pilgrim is a viable source of energy for Nome. The thought is not new, however, the costs of a transmission line from the site to Nome as well as the elusiveness of the source has thwarted any real pursuit of tapping the resource for such a purpose.

If $1 million in matching funds can be found, a $4.6 million federal grant will cover the remaining costs to study techniques for evaluating geothermal potential.

Poole was among the dozen priests accused of sexually abusing juvenile parish members.

No criminal charges could be filed because of a statute of limitations. As the civil cases piled up and some of CBNA's insurance companies refused to pay, CBNA declared bankruptcy in February 2008. Since then, CBNA sorted through its possessions and put two plans before the bankruptcy court. The victims rejected both.

CBNA chancellor Robert Hannon told The Nome Nugget that prior to last week's hearing, mediation talks were held and the victims' representatives agreed to the third amended CBNA bankruptcy plan.

"In broad terms, the parishes chipped in, an insurance carrier paid and then we expect money raised from the sale of Pilgrim Hot Springs," Hannon said. In addition to the parishes, KNOM also contributed money to the bankruptcy plan, Rosenberg said.

Anchorage attorney Ken Roosa, who represents most of the victims, said that the plan "is the best we can get, not as much as we wanted, but you've got to take what you get."

Larger payout sums could be reached when the victims' lawyers go after CBNA's insurers. Hannon said that the CBNA signed over the ability to the claimants to sue the dioceses' insurers. Hannon said that Catholic Mutual and Aetna Traveler's Insurance are not fulfilling the obligations under the policies CBNA had with them. Rosenberg added that the insurers know they have to pay, but at dispute is the amount of money.

If the creditors go after the insurance companies and win a court battle, it could bring an additional $100 million in payments to the victims.

The sale of Pilgrim Hot Springs to the highest bidders is also part of the plan to pay out the victims. A sealed bidding deadline is set for Dec. 10.

Rosenberg said she hopes the bankruptcy proceedings are soon over as the process is very costly. She said that some of the lawyers involved apply discounts but she expects legal fees to be at least $2 million.

After the diocese is out of bankruptcy, Hannon said, the real work is to make amends and to restore the trust. "We have to do a lot of healing," Hannon said.

Of the perpetrators, James E. Jacobson and James Poole are still alive and living in a Jesuit retirement home in Spokane, Wash. Rosenberg said they have not been in contact with the Diocese of Fairbanks and have not issued any statements or apologies.

Rather, Rosenberg said, once the bankruptcy proceedings are over, Bishop Donald Kettler would go around on trips and apologize and focus on healing sessions.

Rosenberg also mentioned that more money might be in store for the survivors of sexual clergy abuse as the Oregon Province of the Society of Jesus—the Jesuit order—also filed for bankruptcy. The deadline to file claims was on Monday, Nov. 30.

• NEST

izers are concerned that the abnormally cold start to the winter may quickly sap its volunteer base. Approximately two dozen volunteer hall monitors can be counted among the NEST group's ranks, requiring several to have already covered multiple shifts in such a short time. "We have had very dedicated and willing volunteers so far. Yet, the winter is just beginning so we are in much need of volunteers," said Abby Huggins, a NEST volunteer who has been one of the ringleaders of the organization.

Indeed, volunteer fatigue was an issue during last year's first run with the NEST shelter, which didn't get its start until March. If the NEST shelter is going to make it through an entire winter, more individuals are going to be needed to help serve as hall monitors.

This year NEST is again operating out of the Nome Church of the Nazarene, using its Karmun Christian Center hall for the night when temperatures are forecasted to drop to at least -10 °F or a wind-chill of -20°F. At the close of last winter, when the temperatures made their final turn from sub-zero territory, it was understood that the shelter would need to find a new building out of which to operate when the cold returned.

Despite efforts through the summer and fall to relocate the shelter to a different facility, NEST still lacked a building as this winter's cold approached. The church again graciously allowed the use of its space this year. A memorandum of agreement has been drafted to cover the expectations and responsibilities of both NEST and the church.

While agreeing to its terms, NEST members are not quite ready to sign memorandum. Established as an ad hoc group of individuals and organizations, NEST has run as

"We have had very dedicated and willing volunteers so far. Yet, the winter is just beginning so we are in much need of volunteers."

— NEST organizer Abby Huggins

an on-the-fly operation since its inception last winter. While the loose structure allowed the organization to quickly create a shelter program out of nearly nothing in March, the lack of formal organization has also hindered NEST in keeping its operation sustainable.

With no legal standing as an incorporated entity, NEST is largely unable to apply for grants and other support. It also puts its members in an uneasy position when it comes to signing agreements and questions of liability. Without a board of directors or an executive, a core group of volunteers has so far made decisions based on a general consensus.

To help ensure the effort continues, that core group has decided to incorporate as a nonprofit entity to help provide NEST the leadership and legal standing it needs to continue its mission. "We are incredibly thankful for the hospitality of the Church of the Nazarene," Huggins said. "We are working on incorporating as an emergency shelter and are excited about this step forward."

NEST had flirted with other facilities in its quest to acquire a space, having entered into tentative negotiations with Woody Sackett to use the basement of the former AC grocery store on Front Street. The need for remodeling—including the addition of restrooms—and the flight of stairs leading down to the space created concerns for NEST over its suitability. Late in the summer as NEST considered the costs of renovations against its small budget and the amount of time available to complete them, the option moved off its radar screen.

Inside the shelter

This year's run for NEST started Nov. 16 when Nome recorded a low of -8°F. It ran the next three nights, breaking for only one day before another three-night run from Nov. 20-22, when temperatures dropped as low as -19°F. The next set of openings came again in a block of three, starting on Thanksgiving.

The normal low temperatures from mid-November until the end of the month range from 11°F to 6°F.

So far the turnout at the shelter has numbered as few as five and as many as 13. As of Monday, 19 different people have stayed at the shelter so far this year.

The doors open to guests at 10 p.m. Often a warm meal is waiting, whether it be a donated stew or an instant Cup-of-Noodles. Guests quickly sign in if they have stayed there before; newcomers are given a breakdown of the rules. Where a room of old Army cots once greeted guests, foldable mats now occupy the floor. The new mats are reportedly more comfortable and absolutely easier to set up and take down. Separate sleeping areas are lined out for men and women. The lights go out at midnight.

Volunteer hall monitor shifts run from 9:30 p.m. to 2 a.m. and 2 a.m. to sometime after 7 a.m. when the church hall is put back in order. Guests are awakened at 6 a.m. and after a quick breakfast most often help clean and store all the shelter's items in a back closet.

The most obvious need for NEST is more volunteer hall monitors, who always work in pairs. But for those who cannot serve as hall monitor, there are other ways to help. "Of course for those who cannot hall monitor, we can always use people to bring food donations—soups, sandwiches, coffee, tea, oatmeal, pilot bread, peanut butter—make phone calls during the day, clean the space we use, help transport laundry, recruit other volunteers, participate in meetings, offer creative ideas," Huggins said.

Those wishing to find out more about NEST's efforts or who are willing to volunteer in any fashion are encouraged to contact Huggins at 304-2898 or send an e-mail to nomesteam@gmail.com.

Shooters take aim for turkeys

Annual air-rifle shoot is the first of several fundraisers

By Sam Schmidt

On Nov. 21, Nome marksmen came from far and wide in hopes of displaying their talent and earning themselves a free turkey.

The turkeys for this year's event were donated by Alaska Commercial Co. and Alaska Trading Co. with additional support coming from the Nome Community Center, the Friends of the NRA, and the Nome Sportsman's Association.

This was the sixth annual Turkey Shoot conducted by the Nome-Beltz JROTC which promotes safe gun handling and then tests the shooters' marksmanship skills on the 10-meter indoor air rifle range. Competitors were given four practice shots and then fired five shots in the standing position. The first through sixth grade shooters were able to compete in the prone position. Shooters took aim at bull's-eyes that are only 1 3/4" for their record score.

This longstanding tradition of JROTC is not the last shoot for the school year. The Nome-Beltz JROTC cadets are planning a New Year's Poker Shoot for Jan. 2 and the third annual Idit-A-Shoot on March 18. Mark your calendar if you would like to try your skills and have a chance at winning some great prizes in either one of these events.

The winners of this year's Turkey Shoot are:

First – sixth grade division: 1) Chase Marvin, 26; 2) William Herzner, 15; 3) Chad Callahan, 13.

Seventh – 12th grade division: 1) Barnaby Longley, 30; 2) Kyle Griemsmann, 23; 3) Cameron Smith, 15.

Graduate/18- to 49-year-old division: 1) Paul Kosto, 39; 2) Kevin Knowlton, 26; 3) Steve Smith, 22.

For the 50-year-old and older division we had no one compete this year.

Wrestlers aim for top three spots

For the second time this year, the Nome-Beltz gym will play host to high school wrestling action this Friday and Saturday.

While many of the same teams that competed in October will again be putting their wrestlers on the mats, this time the competition is do-or-die. The top three wrestlers in each weight class will move on to the 1A2A3A state wrestling meet in Anchorage Dec. 11-12.

Joining Nome will be wrestlers from all the schools in the Bering Straits, Northwest Arctic and North Slope school districts. The preliminary rounds get underway at 5:30 p.m. Dec. 4 for the first session. The second session will start at 9 a.m. Dec. 5, consisting of three rounds. The championship rounds are slated for 2 p.m. on Saturday.

The Colors of Salt

Bob Lawrence, MD
Alaska Family Doctor

Mark Twain’s quip, “All things in moderation, including moderation” describes the typical American view of salt consumption. While most people understand that too much sodium in the diet is unhealthy, excessive amounts of salt in the U.S. food supply makes lowering dietary salt difficult. However, effort put into moderating sodium consumption pays dividends.

Excessive sodium intake has been associated with hypertension, stroke, osteoporosis, kidney stones, and stomach cancer. For this reason, the U.S. Center for Disease Control (CDC) recommends a daily sodium intake of no more than 1,500 mg for any adult over age 20. Recognizing that this may be a difficult change for most, the American Heart Association has set an initial goal of 2,300 mg a day for healthy young adults and a lower goal of 1,500 mg, for older patients or those with high blood pressure, heart disease, or risk factors for stroke.

The 2,300 mg of sodium is roughly equivalent to one level teaspoon of table salt. The lower recommendation of 1500 mg of daily sodium is equivalent to about 1/2 teaspoon of salt. Most Americans consume twice these recommended amounts, much of it hidden in condiments and processed foods.

Excessive sodium intake is harmful to the heart because every cell in the human body has pumps designed to tightly regulate the concentration of sodium. Salt causes trouble at higher levels due to the body’s attempt to keep this concentration constant. Think of the problem like a bowl of soup that is too salty. A cook may correct the problem by adding more water. That is exactly what the body does. It retains water to keep the concentration of sodium balanced in the blood stream. This extra water in the cardiovascular system causes an increase in the pressure of the system leading to hypertension and associated cardiovascular damage to the heart, kidneys, and brain.

So, how can people control their daily intake of sodium? Here are a few ideas:

First, read labels. Many foods like canned soups and processed meats are very high in sodium. Select foods with a lower amount of sodium per serving, and rinse salt-preserved and canned foods.

Second, boost the amount of potassium in the diet to a healthy level. Earlier this year, the results of a large study was published in the Archives of Internal Medicine showing the risk of cardiovascular disease decreased as the ratio of potassium in the diet increased relative to sodium. In other words, foods rich in potassium are good for your heart and counteract the harmful effects of excess sodium. Potassium is best obtained from the diet. Foods rich in potassium include fruits, vegetables, whole grains, salmon, and beans. Potassium supplements can be dangerous and should only be taken under the direction of a physician. People with kidney disease should talk with a provider about the amount of daily potassium that is safe.

Third, make sure that foods you prepare pass the test of tears. That is, does the food taste saltier than tears? Interestingly, the concentration of sodium in human tears remains constant and roughly equals the concentration of sodium in the blood stream. Therefore, foods that taste less salty than tears are likely better for your heart. Consider using the lowest amount of salt necessary when preserving your own foods.

Finally, remember the colors of salt. Not all salt is white. Try to avoid extra salt in its other colors, like red salt in ketchup or salsa, or yellow salt as with mustard. Avoid green salts like pickles or relish. And go easy on brown salts like soy sauce, gravy, and steak sauce.

This may seem like a sacrifice at first, but taste buds easily accommodate a lower concentration of salt, and your heart will appreciate your efforts.

Saying it Sincerely

Reference: Hebrews 10: 11-14, 19-25

Have you ever been to a worship service where you just felt so out of place watching others worship God? I remember going to a church once in my hometown of Houma, Louisiana. The praise and worship music was very good, and I enjoyed that. I actually don't remember much else about this service until it came to the end. Towards the end people started getting carried away, raising their arms, speaking in tongues, and perhaps other things I don't recall. I had heard of these spiritual gifts, but had never seen them. And though it wasn't and still isn't my style of worship, it was apparent that these persons were experiencing something powerful in worship. They were lost in their worship of God. The Holy Spirit had taken hold of them.
Today, we read a sermon from the writer of Hebrews. Our preacher is concerned with tired forms of worship, and this preacher goes on and gives us a few pointers to how we are to worship God in this new and living way.
First, we are to approach worship with a "true heart in full assurance of faith." We are to remember that God is faithful. Worship happens when God's church joins together to remember their creator and savior. And our preacher reminds us that it is through our baptism that we are made part of Christ's body the Church. Through our baptism, we are washed clean.
Second, we are to "hold fast with the confession of our hope without wavering." We are not only to remember that God is faithful, but we are to remember the hope we have in Jesus Christ. The life of these Hebrew Christians in the Roman Empire was tough. Not only did they have to go to church before work, but also at times they had to endure severe persecution. They likely were ridiculed. Their employment opportunities may have been limited due to their faith. Our hope is that in God through Christ, all will be made new.
Third, we are to "provoke on another to love and good deeds." Because we know that God works through us as the Church to help bring about the new world that is promised, we are to be a foretaste of this kingdom to each other and to the world. The way we show God's love to others is through our witness. Our witness is more than our confession of faith, but our love and good deeds.
And so, my challenge to is not only to be present in worship today as often as you are able, but to be actively present in the knowledge, in the expectation that you may catch a glimpse of the divine, and through this activity we call worship – a human activity where God is mysteriously present, we will be made new, be recharged to be God's faithful disciples in this world.

BERING STRAITS REGIONAL HOUSING AUTHORITY
President/CEO Report

P.O. Box 995
Nome, Alaska 99762

FAX No. (907) 443-2160

To inform our region on what Bering Straits Regional Housing Authority is doing in respect to Modernization, Development, and Weatherization programs. Each program has different rules and regulations that we must follow to keep in compliance. In the fall of 2005, BSRHA shut down and went into a reorganization mode. We successfully brought BSRHA back into compliance and have had 2 years (2007 & 2008) with clean audits. This would not have happened if it were not for the Board of Commissioners and staff involvement in correcting the past financial and compliance issues.

Modernization: New boilers are being installed in our oldest homes first in our current assisted stock. This is a three year phased project and our goal is to address all of our homebuyers heating issues with energy efficient boilers which should lower their fuel costs. NAHASDA homes are not included because we do not receive funding to maintain them. That is the responsibility of the homebuyer. BSRHA is also doing electrical assessments and upgrades, project by project throughout the region. Our main goal right now is to address Life, Health, and Safety issues, to bring current our yearly home inspections, to keep in compliance with HUD requirements and to address the high Tenant Account Receivables. BSRHA has become a policy driven organization and will enforce our policies. BSRHA continues to rehabilitate vacant units around the region.

Development: We are contracting out the next phase of houses that are to be built (3 in Golovin, 5 in Koyuk, and 4 in Elim). Elim will be getting sewer & water extensions for the 4 new houses, Koyuk will be getting laterals for their 5 new houses and Golovin will be getting septic systems for their 3 new houses. We are going to provide 2 houses for Council and 1 for Solomon by acquisition and then use modernization and weatherization funds to bring these homes up to speed before we turn them over to new homebuyers. BSRHA is encouraging our homebuyers and home owners in the villages to apply for the weatherization program.

You can contact Frank Johnson at BSRHA and/or the IRA's in your village for applications. BSRHA has a 5 year plan for units to be assessed each fiscal year. All units in this plan are presently HUD/CAS, although we now know that home owners can also apply. Of the units assessed in a given year, a minimum of 24 will receive weatherization services based upon the preference standards established by AHFC. BSRHA would encourage people to call the office if you have any issues and hopefully we (BSRHA) can help resolve them following our policies and procedures.

2009-10 Snow Removal Policy & Procedures

Listed below are the prioritized actions that the City of Nome will undertake during the 2009-2010 snow season. These actions are meant as a guide and DO NOT commit the City to any course of action other than that which is deemed to be in the best interests of safety and City resources.

I. During major blizzards and ground storms, City crews will stand by and only attempt to open streets as required in emergency situations.

II. Once the storm has abated, every effort will be made to open fire lanes (one lane) on every street in town.

III. Once fire lanes have been established, crews will begin to open major (school bus) routes to two lanes of traffic. Streets identified as priority are:

- East and West 5th Ave. • East 1st Ave. • West 2nd Ave. • West E Street • East K Street • Icy View Loop • East N Street • Steadman Street

IV. Once major routes have been opened to two lanes of traffic, crews will begin opening the remaining streets to two lanes of traffic.

V. Once all streets have been opened to two lanes of traffic, crews will systematically begin to widen, clean and haul snow to designated snow storage sites. Service areas will be rotated in order that all areas of town receive equal treatment during this clean up.

VI. Sanding of select streets will be performed by ADOT. Other streets will be sanded when conditions warrant and resources allow.

VII. The major snow storage for the City of Nome will be: The snow storage site located off the By-pass road.

Once again these plans are meant as a guide. We will take actions contrary to this plan as necessary. We urge citizens of Nome to help us keep the streets safe and usable. Some things that will help our efforts are:

- Cars should be parked off the rights-of-way as much as possible during the clearing and removal of snow;
- Obstructions (buildings, dog houses, snow machines, 4-wheelers, trash boxes, etc.) that prevent removal of snow should be moved farther on to private property if at all possible;
- Be alert to the area of town in which we are working and, if at all possible, keep parked cars and traffic to a minimum in these areas;
- Pushing of snow into the public right-of-way after a street has been cleared is discouraged.

After hours, on weekends and holidays, City crews will be on-call as needed. Due to the limited resources within the City, local contractors will be utilized to provide additional manpower and equipment as necessary. If you have any questions, please feel free to contact Public Works Dept. at 443-5653.

Thank you!

Foster follows father's footsteps to Finance Committee

By Tyler Rhodes

Nome and the surrounding district's newest legislator is wasting little time in establishing himself in among his legislative peers.

Appointed to his late father's seat by Gov. Sean Parnell Oct. 10 and confirmed by the House Democrats just a few days later, Rep. Neal Foster took another step in his father's footsteps Nov. 16 by receiving an appointment to the powerful House Finance Committee.

Richard Foster had held the seat at the time of his Oct. 13 death, albeit as a Democrat working with the Republican majority. The new Rep. Foster takes the seat as a member of the minority Democrats.

The path to the committee seat has also served as a crash course in Juneau politics. At the outset, the House Democrats said they would not confirm a candidate who would wants to change that. "I just got word that Chevak is having a Dec. 10 council meeting. If I can pull it off, I would like to attend," Foster said. "I just really want to make sure I am focusing on everybody."

A pilot, Foster said he may try and fly throughout the district after the winter. He also admitted that he may not be able to visit as much of the district personally as he would like, citing limitations of time and funds. Foster said he is working on reaching out more via social media applications, such as e-mail and Facebook to try and make more connections with his constituents. "I'm getting a lot of people adding me [as friends on Facebook] that I've never met before," he said.

As a younger legislator at 37, Foster said the use of newer communication technologies could help

"It's not House District 39's seat, it's the Democratic caucus's seat."

— Rep. Neal Foster

not align him or herself with the minority caucus. That additional caucus member gave the Democrats one more seat on the committee. Whether or not the seat was the carrot on the stick or a reward for allegiance is simply fodder for political speculation. What is known, however, is that the position is rather helpful in steering funds back to a committee member's home district.

Neal Foster is aware of the appointment's significance. "I know there are people who have been around longer than me and have more seniority," he said. He is also aware of who put him there. "It's not House District 39's seat, it's the Democratic caucus's seat."

"We welcome Neal to our caucus, and we have put our trust in his ability to serve our state well in this important capacity," said Minority Leader Rep. Beth Kerttula (D-Juneau) in a press release from the House Democrats.

While Foster had gained seats in the Legislature and the Finance Committee, it has come at the expense of one at a local table. Foster said he resigned from the Nome Common Council Nov. 23.

Initially after his appointment by the governor, Foster indicated that he would remain on the council. He said his opinion changed after discussing the matter with the state ethics officials and fellow legislators. He was advised that remaining on the council did not run afoul of ethics rules, per se, but he was also told it was the appropriate move as to avoid any conflicts of interest. He has signaled, however, that he will remain on the boards of directors for Sitnasuak and Bering Straits Native corps.

Foster pledges that he wants to remain directly involved in the district's affairs and throughout an interview with The Nome Nugget and other news outlets has suggested an aggressive attempt to make better connections with the southern portion of the district. Foster's district covers the Norton Sound region as well as the area around the lower Yukon, including villages like Hooper Bay and Chevak, which are accessed by Bethel.

All the candidates who applied to fill the vacant House seat admitted to have little experience in working or traveling through the southern area. Served by a different hub city than the northern portion of the district, the southern area is limited in access to its representative and vice-versa. Foster said he expand his ability to connect with the district. "My dad didn't even know where the on button on the computer was," he laughed.

Among the issues he wants to broach with his constituents are the creation of more jobs and combating many of the social problems experienced in the region. For Foster, the two issues go hand-in-hand, noting that a stable economy and jobs helps improve the quality of life for a region.

On that note, he said he wants to support the growth of manufacturing or value-added economies in rural Alaska that can replace the state's dependence on resource extraction. He said, however, that doesn't mean he is opposed to resource development. He noted that he supports projects like Nome's currently idled Rock Creek Mine. "I want to see them succeed. I just want to see that it's done the right way," he said.

On another hot-button issue, Foster said he is optimistic in regard to the recent announcement that the federal government would be taking another look at subsistence rights in Alaska. "Now is such an opportune time to work on the issue of subsistence," Foster said. "Gov. Parnell has signaled he's willing to sit down and talk on it." Foster said he supports an Alaska Native preference for subsistence rights, followed by a rural preference. "If we can't [have a Native preference], the next best option would be to get the rural preference." Foster, however, admitted that gaining statewide support for such changes would be a challenge.

The plaque commemorates the funding the elder Foster sought for the construction of the new facility which was dedicated in 2005. The younger Foster will also find himself in a position to influence funding throughout the state with an appointment to the House Finance Committee, a spot where his father also sat. The appointment to the powerful seat is a rarity for a legislator making his or her debut in office.

Public bowls over plans to remove alley

Council to re-examine bowling alley removal

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Common Council agreed to reconsider plans to remove the Nome Recreation Center's inoperative bowling alley and replace it with space for meetings, storage and other uses after hearing public appeals to repair and revitalize the facility during a council meeting Dec. 14.

Nome business owner Matt Tomter is leading an effort to upgrade, reopen and staff the bowling alley with a manager certified to maintain its equipment. He told council members he had asked about plans for the bowling alley at the Rec Center two weeks ago and was told public interest in the facility is lacking, equipment parts are unavailable and there is no one in Nome to maintain the equipment.

Sitnasuak again rescues JROTC

By Tyler Rhodes

With Sitnasuak Native Corp. assuming the role of Santa, the Nome Public Schools Junior Reserve Officers' Training Corps received an early Christmas present during the Nome Board of Education meeting Dec. 8.

Armed with an oversized check, Sitnasuak board president Crystal Andersen-Booth and fellow members Neal Foster and Janice Doherty were on hand to announce the $100,000 gift to keep the program afloat for another year. This is the second $100,000 gift Sitnasuak has presented for the program, repeating a move the Nome area's Alaska Native corporation made in July.

Both substantial donations were made through a recently enacted law that allows offsets of donations to vocational programs against taxes owed to the state. Using the same tax-credit program, Bering Straits Native Corp. announced a $200,000 donation to the Northwest Alaska Career and Technical Center, or NACTEC, on June 1. Donations of $100,000 to $200,000 receive a 100 percent tax credit while lesser donations receive a 50 percent credit.

The gifts have kept the military-styled program alive as it appeared to be headed for the chopping block at the start of this school year. The program has teetered on the edge of existence for a number of years as the district first pulled JROTC out of its budget for the 2008-2009 school

Pilgrim to go to the highest bidder

By Diana Haecker

In the continued bankruptcy proceedings of the Catholic diocese of Fairbanks the end is in sight as the diocese and the claimants filed a joint consensual bankruptcy plan at the federal bankruptcy court in Anchorage on Monday, Dec. 14.

The diocese—the business side of the church is known as the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska or CBNA—has filed for bankruptcy protection when confronted with hundreds of claims of sexual abuse at the hands of priests and lay workers decades ago.

On Monday, CBNA's chancellor Robert Hannon, director of finances

George Bowder and business administrator Tom Buzek told The Nome Nugget that the claimants have agreed to a third amended bankruptcy plan which includes an agreed upon minimal payment of $9.8 million to the close to 300 victims of sexual abuse at the hands of former priests, including KNOM founder and former Nome priest Jim Poole.

Part of the settlement money is to come from the sale of Pilgrim Hot Springs to the highest bidder. The cemetery is excluded from the property and will not be sold. Hannon said that the estimated price for the 320-acre property is somewhere in the neighborhood of $1.8 million on the low end. The deadline to submit a bid has been extended from Dec. 10 to Feb. 24, 2010 at 5 p.m. The sealed bids will then be opened in the bankruptcy court in Anchorage.

The court will then decide if the correct financial information is included in the bid, and if equal amounts are bid, the court will then decide if there will be an oral auction. Hannon said whoever wins the bid on Feb. 25 has to transfer the cash of the sale within 30 days to the settlement trust account administered by a court-appointed official.

City throws $100,000 into the pool

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Common Council voted unanimously to allocate the City's 2009 community benefit share of $100,000 from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. for repair of the Nome-Beltz High School swimming pool at a meeting on Monday.

During a public hearing prior to the decision, Mitch Erickson asked that part of the community benefit share funds be used to add lighting at the skating rink for the safety of hockey players and others, and to plant grass at ball fields at the Nome Recreation Center to reduce dust.

However, council members cited a written recommendation from Acting Project Manager Randy Romenesko to use the $100,000 to complete replacement of old pumps, valves, controls, fans and piping in the heating system, both air and water, at the pool. Last year the council allocated the 2008 community benefit share of $100,000 from NSEDC to the swimming pool project, which originally was estimated to cost $155,000. Romenesko said additional work components had been added at the school's request—$6,000 to replace all valves in the pool heating system and $30,000 for a new motor and VFD for the main air handling unit—bringing the total project cost close to $200,000.

cally requests more involvement of rural residents and called for more direct consultation with a broader base of affected individuals, organizations and communities. Murkowski introduces bill to study feasibility of an Arctic deep-water port

Last week, U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski introduced legislation to study the feasibility of building a deep-water port in the Arctic. Murkowski did not specify which areas the study should focus on. The Arctic Deep Water Sea Port Act would direct the Secretary of Defense to conduct the study in an effort to protect U.S. strategic interests in the region. The two-year study would investigate strategic capabilities of a deep-water port as well as the best location. It also would look at the resource and time frame needs to establish such a port, given the complex environmental constraints that the Arctic marine environment provides. Murkowski said that the United States needs to be able to guard its territorial claims and its economic interests in the Arctic, especially as a decrease in seasonal ice is leading to increased marine activity in the region.

ICC chair says Eskimos should be exempt from greenhouse gas cutbacks

According to Canadian news outlet CBC news, Jimmy Stotts, the Alaska chairman of the Inuit Circumpolar Council, said during the United Nations climate change summit in Copenhagen that people living in the circumpolar North should be exempt from mandatory greenhouse-gas cutbacks. Stotts said Eskimo and Inuit should be allowed to making their economies grow through mining and oil and gas exploration opportunities. ICC members are worried about the impact strong greenhouse-gas emission targets would have on those economic drivers, he said. The ICC represents indigenous people from northern Canada, Alaska, Greenland and Russia.

Governor proposes FY 2011 budget

Governor Sean Parnell announced his budget proposal for 2011 on Monday, December 14, a day before the budget was released. Parnell said in a press conference that he focused on education, public safety, transportation and resource development. The operating and capital budgets total $4.7 billion and the operating budget funds K-12 education and increases law enforcement throughout the state. The capital budget is $1.5 billion for resource development, infrastructure and investment. Last week, Parnell declared war on domestic violence and sexual assaults, but his budget only provides $7 million for DV and sexual assault prevention. Other line items of the governor's budget are oil and gas exploration tax credits with $180 million, community revenue sharing worth $60 million and gas line projects totaling $177 million, including $150 million for the AGIA reimbursement fund and $6.5 million for in-state gas development. Parnell budgeted $708 million for highway and aviation projects, $38 million for the DEC Village Safe Water and $23.2 million for municipal water and sewer projects, $25 million for the renewable energy grant fund, $75 million for a state crime lab and $108.6 million for a University of Alaska science building. Parnell also continued Gov. Murkowski's Road to Resources program and submitted an aggressive transportation plan to build a road to Umiat to connect to known and prospective oil and gas resources from the Dalton Highway. The road would provide year-round access to the Umiat oil field and the Gubik gas complex. It would also allow putting seasonal equipment at the doorstep of the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska. Parnell's budget includes $8 million for the Department of Transportation and Public Facilities to pursue permitting to build the road. Comparably pocket change, Parnell proposed $1.3 million for improved research and management of Western Alaska salmon stocks.

As details of the budget were released past the Nome Nugget's press time, it was unsure if Parnell included funds for the DOT's current study to see if a road or transportation corridor to Nome would be feasible. The report on the study was supposed to be released in December, but DOT requested more information and pushed back the report's release to January, 2010.

Judge halts timber sale in Tongass

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick issued an injunction halting the Orion North timber sale in the Tongass National Forest last week. The court ordered the Forest Service to reevaluate the project because the costs for the timber sale have skyrocketed since the project was proposed a decade ago while revenues have dropped dramatically.

The Orion North project was planned in a roadless area on Revilla Island near Ketchikan in the Tongass National Forest. The sale would have required six miles of new roads to clear-cut an old-growth forest. The Orion North plan would have cost taxpayers $1.6 million to build roads for a timber sale in a national forest that would generate only $140,635 for the trees. This expense would have cost taxpayers nearly 11 times the revenues generated by the sale.

Better Business Bureau warns of puppy scams in Alaska

Robert Andrew, CEO of Better Business Bureau in Alaska, Oregon and Western Washington alerted the Alaska public of con artists posing as dog breeders. The typical scam involves ads for inexpensive or free puppies in a newspaper or online classified. The scammers often only communicate through e-mails and ask the buyer to wire money for shipping, vaccinations and licensing paper work. The BBB says to buy pets locally from a year. The City of Nome stepped in to take up the slack with a $136,000 appropriation that year after receiving impassioned pleas from parents and community members. The Nome Common Council declined a $118,000 request this summer, and it wasn't until the Sitnasuak donation in late July that JROTC was able to again breathe a sigh of relief for the 2009-2010 school year.

The announcement came as a surprise to many in the room, including Superintendent Jon Wehde. The district's top administrator had been working on a plan to provide the program with sustainable funding at the time of Sitnasuak's announcement. Much of Wehde's effort was based on convincing local businesses to also participate in the tax credit program. That job appeared much easier following the Dec. 8 announcement. "With Sitnasuak behind us, I'm sure the business community can make up the difference," he said.

Operations foreman position approved

The board gave its blessing to the creation of a new administrative position within the district, allowing Wehde to start searching for a district operations foreman. The position will cover a bit of everything that goes into making the district's operations run smoothly. The operations manager will coordinate food service activities, manage the district's apartment building, supervise custodial work and manage the transportation fleet, among other tasks.

The position will be a year-round job, a fact that elicited concern from board member Barb Nickels. Noting that many of the items in the position's job description are only needed during the school year, Nickels questioned the need to have a new employee report to work all year. "Will they still have things to do?" she asked.

Wehde assured Nickels that especially with custodial duties assigned, the operations foreman will not simply be punching the clock come summer. "There's plenty to do ma'am," Wehde said. "There's no shovels to lean on here."

The board also got a peek at another position that the administration is proposing. Native programs director Jon Berkeley gave the board a short presentation on a potential Alaska Native education coordinator position.

Berkeley told the board the position would serve four main categories: direct service to students; ensure compliance with the various state and federal programs that underlie certain funding streams; serve as a liaison between the district and the community in regard to Alaska Native education; and serve as an inter-agency liaison between the district and organizations such as the area's Alaska Native corporations and tribal entities.

The draft proposal received support from board president Gloria Karmun. "I'm really glad to see it being implemented and considered, since so many Native entities in this town are contributing to the schools," she said.

Green light given for budget revision

The board gave its approval to revisions made to the district budget. The revisions come after the final student count and the negotiated salary agreement between the district and the education association were finalized. The revisions result in a balanced budget. The changes resulted in a decrease in expenditures of $118,131 and a decrease in revenues of $123,514. An additional $5,383 was transferred out of the budget to reflect the actual costs of providing student transportation.

The October student count, which determines the level of state funding for the district's schools, was two students short of what was projected in the initial budget. However, the district gained more students who need more intensive support, which reflected in more state funding.

The budget report notes offsetting decreases in both revenues and expenditures for retirement payments to the tune of hundreds of thousands of dollars. On the revenue side, the state will provide $274,828 fewer dollars than the district originally budgeted for retirement payments. However, the district noted savings of $302,874 in benefits it provides due to the retirement payout reduction, a less-than-expected increase in health insurance premiums and fewer employees participating in the district's health insurance plan.

In other business:

- Wehde said the district will open salary negotiations again with teachers in January.

- Nickels requested that the administration make further inquiries as to developing an online version of district policies with the aid of the Alaska Association of School Boards.

- The board passed three district policy changes and/or additions. Students will now have to be immunized against varicella (chicken pox) prior to first entry into school. The second change dealt with the district's response to and planning for a pandemic disease outbreak. The third change dealt with the timeframe in which the district needs to notify parents of the option to transfer their children to another public school if the current school is found to be failing in terms of the No Child Left Behind Act.

- The board opted to not hold its work session scheduled for Dec. 22. The next board meeting is slated for Jan. 12.

Schubert promoted to Bering Straits CEO

The regional Alaska Native corporation representing Nome and the Norton Sound region promoted one of its own to the rank of chief executive officer.

Bering Straits Native Corp. announced Dec. 9 that longtime BSNC board member and former executive vice president Gail Schubert would step into the CEO role as current president—and former CEO—Tim Towarak prepares to retire as an officer within the next few years. In a prepared statement, Towarak described the move as a “transitional leadership change.”

Schubert, originally from Unalakleet, has also served as general counsel to the corporation since 2003. She has been on the board of directors since 1992. Towarak served as CEO for a decade. “I am really honored to have been given the title and position as CEO,” Schubert said. “I look forward to continuing to work really hard to advance the business and affairs of Bering Straits Native Corp.”

Schubert said that after working closely with Towarak for the past five or six years, there will be little visible change as she assumes the role of CEO. “I think that things will continue along the same manner in which the work is currently conducted, with the exception that the Nome office will now fall under my supervision,” she said.

Schubert said one of her main priorities in moving the corporation forward will be to ensure proposed changes to the Small Business Administration’s 8(a) contracting program do not adversely affect BSNC. The government contracting program has been vital to the corporation’s financial recovery over the last decade, currently accounting for 90 percent of BSNC’s revenues. “There’s some changes to the mentor/protégé program that we’re keeping an eye on,” she said. “Smaller [Alaska Native corporations] like us are more reliant on having a mentor who is able to do what mentors do, which is help us get the kind of experience we need to do the work ourselves, or, in some cases, provide the liquidity we may not have.”

Prior to joining BSNC, Schubert practiced law in Anchorage for 10 years after working at several Wall Street firms, including the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. She is the daughter of Betty Anagick and the late Lowell Anagick Sr.

Schubert, who will continue to serve as the corporation’s general counsel for now, earned an undergraduate degree from Stanford University, followed by an MBA from Cornell University’s Johnson School of Management with an emphasis in accounting and finance. She graduated from Cornell University School of Law and joined the New York bar. In addition to the BSNC board, Schubert serves on the boards of several other Alaska organizations, including the Alaska Federation of Natives, the Alaska Native Heritage Center, Alaska Native Justice Center and the Alaska Retirement Management Board.

Towarak has led the company since August

2000, during which time BSNC’s gross revenues have grown from $9 million to today’s $162 million. During the past several years, BSNC expanded its Anchorage office leading to dramatically increased involvement in federal contracts through the Small Business Administration’s 8(a) program. That effort resulted in the recent award of the contract to build the new Norton Sound Regional Hospital to BSNC’s joint venture with Neeser Construction Inc. In October, the BSNC Board declared a dividend of $1.50 a share, the corporation’s largest to date.

BSNC has approximately 6,300 shareholders and includes the villages of Brevig Mission, Council, Diomed, Golovin, King Island, Koyuk, Mary’s Igloo, Nome, Shaktoolik, Shishmaref, Solomon, St. Michael, Stebbins, Teller, Unalakleet, Wales and White Mountain.

Headquartered in Nome, the corporation’s regional operations include real estate management and development, tourism, construction, mining services, and sales of rock and aggregate. BSNC’s Anchorage office and other subsidiaries outside Alaska provide services to the federal government and other customers through the Small Business Administration’s 8(a) program.

Sen. Hollis French makes an early campaign stop in Nome

By Tyler Rhodes

State senator and gubernatorial hopeful Hollis French paid Nome a visit last week that was as much an effort to familiarize himself with the region and its issues as it was a campaign stop.

French, a former assistant district attorney and oil field worker, has served as a Democratic Anchorage representative to the Alaska State Senate since 2003. He stepped into the race for governor in July.

French made a quick trip to Nome Dec. 9, meeting with leadership from Kawarak, giving interviews to KNOM radio and The Nugget, and attending the Nome Christmas Extravaganza and tree lighting ceremony. French had attempted to visit Nome Dec. 5 to also make a stop at the Fireman’s Carnival, but the morning flight was canceled that day due to a storm.

French and his wife, Peggy, were treated to a beautiful day and mild temperatures on their successful attempt to make it to Nome Dec. 9. As the sun set, French stopped by The Nugget’s offices to speak about his campaign and what he sees as the primary issues facing Alaska.

French said he believes the defining issue of the fall election will be the state’s effort to spur development of a natural gas pipeline to the Lower 48. French is a supporter of the Alaska Gasline Inducement Act (AGIA), former Gov. Sarah Palin’s pipeline initiative. French said AGIA has so far served its purpose in that there are currently two pipeline projects moving forward—one within the framework of the legislation proposed by TransCanada and a competing project being developed of AGIA by ConocoPhillips and BP.

Sen. Hollis French

If the gas line is finally realized, an economic dream of Alaska’s for decades, the benefits to Southcentral Alaska are perhaps more readily apparent in terms of cheaper energy from a possible spur line supplying gas to communities along its path. Anchorage and the surrounding area would also likely see a general boost as the probable headquarters and staging grounds for much of the pipeline work.

French acknowledged that outside of potential jobs on the gas line’s construction, rural Alaska will not feel that first bump that comes with the project. French said the benefit to Bush Alaska will come in more of a rising tide that lifts all ships scenario. “You get [the benefit] in the form of state revenues, municipal revenue sharing, tuition scholarships,” he said.

For that reason, French said striking the right deal to ensure Alaska receives the highest possible return for the resource is paramount, especially when the economics of natural gas are not nearly as robust as oil. “The real measure of a gas line is if you do it on terms that benefit the entire state and not just the Railbelt,” he said.

French acknowledged the impacts of high energy costs in rural Alaska and their detrimental effects to communities, often forcing people to move to urban areas. “It’s not good for the state to have the rural economy collapse and everyone move to Anchorage,” French said.

As for where some of that revenue from oil and gas should go, French is a big proponent of developing alternative energy systems throughout the state. “The point right now is to take the dollars from the sales of nonrenewable resources and invest them in renewable energy projects,” he said.

French also said education would figure large in his campaign. French said he would like to see pre-kindergarten educational opportunities offered statewide. “You get enormous benefits from pre-K,” he said. For older students, French said he advocates more vocational education offerings.

The third major issue on which French said he is basing his campaign is safety. “The social ills that plague parts of the state are horrific,” he said. French cited his work as an assistant district attorney based out of Anchorage as giving him insight into the issue.

Prior to earning his law degree from Cornell, French worked for five years in the oil industry in Cook Inlet before a seven-year stint at Kuparuk on the North Slope during its peak production days. While working on the Slope, French took classes at the University of Alaska Anchorage, earning his bachelor’s degree. French feels his diverse experience will serve him well as he campaigns. “Alaskans expect people to be well-rounded. They like to see someone who has worked with their hands sometime in their lives,” he said.

Others besides French so far vying for the Democratic nomination include Bob Poe, a former executive director of several state-level authorities and offices, and former Rep. Ethan Berkowitz.

Planners to call in the expert

Commission tackles full slate as Irene Anderson retires

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Planning Commission has a table loaded with planning issues and has started to roll up sleeves to get busy in 2010.

Issues needing attention include updating the comprehensive plan, deciding on a process for permitting land use changes under the recently adopted zoning ordinance, honoring and identifying historic buildings, and the transfer of the Nome Bypass Road to City of Nome.

Nome’s planning panel met Dec. 8 in a work session to discuss these work orders and followed with a brief regular commission meeting.

The Bypass Road is off the slate as a pending punch-list of work orders has been completed. The city has already taken responsibility for that route north of town that runs from Front Street to the Nome-Teller Highway.

The commission voiced strong support for once more retaining the expert services of contract planner Eileen Bechtol of Bechtol Planning and Development in Homer for work on zoning and historic building issues. Bechtol worked with the planning commission in creating the zoning package and other comprehensive and coastal lands issues.

Planners also discussed a solution to the apparent practice of some people picking up hammer and saw and getting a project underway before buying a building permit. Some members of the commission advocated adding a penalty amount to tardy building permits. Overall, members thought this suggestion could go to the city and the issue would properly become an NCCI—Nome Common Council Issue. Through Nov. 30, the city has collected about $200,000 for permits for a $55 million valuation in building and remodeling projects started in 2009.

In other business, the commission granted to Alaska Gold a two-year extension for Phase 2 of the Nome 21st Century Subdivision. The Commission approved Phase 1 and Phase 2 in October 2007; the Phase 2 approval was about to expire. The request for a time extension stems from “unanticipated cash flow restrictions attendant with the Rock Creek Mine,” according to a note to the commission from subdivision surveyor George Krier. He said he expected work orders attached to approval to be finished within the next two years.

Chair of the Nome Planning Commission Irene Anderson announced her retirement from the group after many years’ service. She and hubby Babe Anderson plan to become snowbirds.

Planners praised Anderson’s dedication.

“She is the definition of professional,” commission member Jeff Darling said in a separate interview. “She has worked hard in everything she has undertaken. She cuts right through the BS and gets it done.”

• Pilgrim

Agriculture grant administrated by the University of Alaska Fairbanks to locate the geothermal source has elevated the property’s value, Hannon said. Church officials hope for many bidders to participate in the sale and get the word out via ads, contacts in the geothermal energy development community and other business contacts.

Buzek said there has been a great deal of interest in Pilgrim Hot Springs, both in and outside of Alaska. While outside companies may see Pilgrim as a business opportunity, it harbors memories and emotional connections to Nomeites. In meetings with Nome residents, Tom Buzek said, everybody expressed the wish to keep Pilgrim Hot Spring open for public use. “That will be difficult to add as a stipulation to the sale,” Buzek said. “It is going to be up to the new owner how accessible the hot springs will be.”

CBNA is to release details on timeline, location and required information for the sealed bidding process within the next week.

Hannon said that the parties are still working out last details, and if the court accepts the consensual joint bankruptcy plan, money has to be in the settlement account in the last week of January and first payments may be out as early as the beginning of February 2010.

VALUABLE PROPERTY—The property surrounding Pilgrim Hot Springs could soon be out of the Catholic Church’s hands.

Lady Nanooks split openers

The Lady Nanook basketball squad came out of their open weekend with a split record of 1-1 after hosting Monroe-Catholic at the Nome Recreation Center.

Hilary Stiles led Nome in its come-from-behind win Friday night with a 15-point effort in the 35-33 victory. Stiles was four-for-seven from the three-point line. Devynn Johnson also contributed a double-digit effort, knocking down 10 points and grabbing 13 boards as the Lady Nanooks battled back from an 11-point deficit.

Monroe battled back the next day, edging out Nome 34-29. Johnson led the Lady Nanooks in scoring for the Saturday game, notching 11 points and pulling down 15 rebounds. Stiles and Richelle Homer each added six points.

"The girls played a great man-to-man defense both nights. I believe the girls put on a great show for just 10 practices and showed a small percentage of their potential that will come in the future," said head coach Doug Boyer. "We are taking this experience and moving forward to prepare for Valdez at the first round of the ACS tournament."

The Lady Nanooks will celebrate the new year in Anchorage while attending the Anchorage Christian School tournament Dec. 31-Jan. 2. In the meantime, women's basketball action will continue in Nome as former Nanooks take the court for an alumni tournament to be held this Friday starting at 6:15 p.m. at Nome-Beltz and Saturday starting at 11 a.m. at the Rec Center.

Boys basketball kick off the season at Rec Center

The Nanook boys basketball team is ready to take their game to the court.

Coming on the heels of a runner-up finish at state last year, Nome will open its season at the Nome Recreation Center this Saturday and Monday against Monroe-Catholic High School. The Rams, visiting from Fairbanks, should prove a good early-season test for the Nanooks as they are coming off a 21-win season with a state tourney berth themselves.

Familiar faces will dot the court again this season for the Nanooks as many of last year's players will return this year. Notably absent, however, will be former standout Jesse Blandford who graduated last year and is now playing for the University of Alaska Anchorage. Nome is again coached by Pat Callahan this year.

Monroe is coached by Frank Ostanik, who is widely regarded as one of the top coaches in the state. Monroe competes in the Aurora Conference with Valdez, Delta, Eielson, Glennallen and Nenana.

Both Saturday's and Monday's games start at 7 p.m. at the Rec. Center.

On Dec. 26 and 27, the boys will host an alumni tournament at Nome-Beltz. Over New Year's the boys will travel to Anchorage to compete in the Anchorage Christian School tournament Dec. 31-Jan. 2.

Golovin again nets runner-up honors at mixed-6 state tourney

By Jeff Erickson

Not many high schools with fewer than 20 students field athletic teams that are competitive on a statewide level.

Even fewer win a state championship.

And only one that this writer knows of can boast of three state championships. But with only a couple of sets between them and that fourth championship during the state mixed-six volleyball tournament, the Golovin Lynx fell just short of the title Dec. 12.

Golovin had to feel a bit of déjà vu as Point Hope bested them on the court for the second year in a row to take the title. Fellow Bering Strait School District competitors, Unalakleet, worked their way to fourth at the tourney.

After winning the Western/Interior Conference tournament in a tightly fought contest with the Unalakleet Wolfpack, the Golovin Lynx mixed-6 volleyball squad entered the eight-team state tournament looking to add to their school's legacy.

Led by senior hitter Frank Amaktoolik, Jr. and junior setter Sheralyn Sockpealuk, the purple and gold were a team to be reckoned with. Joining them at the state tournament was the second-place Wolfpack, another formidable team who had split contests with Golovin during the season.

The state tournament pairings are determined by a rotation schedule, and the result is that often top teams face each other in opening round matches. This was the case as the Unalakleet squad found itself facing the defending state champion Point Hope Harpooners.

It was an epic battle with Unalakleet squandering a late first game lead to lose 27-25, only to bounce back to win the next two games and take a 2-1 lead. In the fourth game a string of successful serves gave the Harpooners a lead they didn't relinquish, and a fifth game was necessary to determine the winner. After some furious rallies, the team from the north began to pull away and squeaked out a 15-11 victory to advance to the semi-finals.

Golovin had no such trouble with the second-ranked team from the arctic, the Noatak Lynx. With a powerful offense and excellent serving, Golovin dominated their opponents. Amaktoolik delivered many crushing kills to emphasize the victory.

Though disappointed in their first round loss, the Unalakleet team regrouped on Friday to crush an over-matched Russian Mission team in straight sets in a match reminiscent of their meeting in the 2008 tournament. All-stars Pete Kotongan and Katiya Erickson, hitter and setter respectively, led the Wolfpack both offensively and defensively. Kotongan's all-court hitting was easily the most impressive of any player at the tournament.

Golovin took further advantage of their bracket by easily handling a Kwethluk Kings team in the semi-final match. The Lynx overwhelmed the team from the Kuskokwim with swarming defense and powerful hitting by Amaktoolik and Robert "Bam" Moses, Jr.

Bam also added his special skill of accurate "dinking" to score many points en route to an easy 3-0 set victory.

Unalakleet's second-round victory put them into the fourth-place match against the Noatak Lynx. Again, Kotongan showed senior leadership by hitting from every position on the court and delivering his booming serve to win points every time his team needed them. Solid play by the rest of the Wolfpack earned them a straight-set victory.

The championship match was a re-match from 2008, and many in attendance believed that this would be Golovin's year to defeat Point Hope. The Lynx quickly showed that they believed the same as they took game one. But, after a couple of critical serving errors in game two, the Harpooners offense began to pick up steam. With emotions high, they put the pressure on the Lynx and won games two and three. Backs against the wall, the Golovin squad fought to push the match to a fifth and final game, but came up short.

Point Hope won the match to add to their championship run and the Lynx were left to ponder what might have been. While second place in state is a commendable achievement, Golovin measures its success in championships won—something they've done more than any school their size.

Giving: The Healthy Part of the Holidays

Bob Lawrence, MD

Alaska Family Doctor

Many parts of the holiday season make your doctor cringe. High carbohydrate desserts, sedentary feasting, high-stress family gatherings, and the new mix of viruses from all over the country conspire to undo months of hard work toward a healthy lifestyle. But the season also contains protective elements.

Research shows one part of the season that is good for us is giving. Whether the motive is altruism, religious conviction, tradition, or even compulsion, charitable giving and its counterpart volunteering, which are both so much a part of the holiday season, are consistently associated with improved health.

Helping others has been shown to strengthen the immune system and boost endorphins, the body's natural pain-killers, and the social interactions associated with volunteering have long been recognized as having a protective effect on the cardiovascular system.

Furthermore, people who give money, volunteer their time, or share their skills with others tend to live longer. A study of elderly persons in California published in the Journal of Health Psychology in 1999 showed that regular volunteers lowered their risk of death by 63 percent. A similar study out of Michigan in the early 1990s suggested that doing volunteer work increased life expectancy more than any other activity.

There is also an intrinsic reward to charitable giving. According to a study published in the journal Science in 2007, charitable giving excites the same area of the brain known to process other pleasurable behaviors like eating food, tasting chocolate, sitting with a friend, or receiving gifts.

The study involved an MRI scan of the brain when volunteers were subjected to three scenarios: first when given $100; second when taxed on this amount to support a food-bank; and third when allowed to voluntarily give an amount to charity. Not surprisingly, the reward centers of the brain—the caudate, nucleus accumbens, and the insula—responded to receiving money. Somewhat surprising was the finding that the same areas light up when subjects watched their account taxed for support of a local food bank. Who knew paying taxes could be rewarding? The greatest effect of all, however, was seen when subjects were allowed to voluntarily give from their accounts.

This modern MRI data supports the idea that giving is better for us than receiving. It reminds us that the healthiest and most rewarding part of season is the tradition of giving gifts to those we love and those in need, perhaps in celebration of the birth of the Savior who himself said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Have a Merry Christmas.

David G. Elmore
Reference: Luke 1: 68-79
“What Do You Want for Christmas?”

So what’s on your Christmas list this year? And all this talk of Christmas gifts begs the question – why do we give each other gifts for Christmas? I suggest that we give gifts this season is in remembrance of the wonderful Gift that God has given us in becoming human in the person of Jesus Christ and walking among us. Giving gifts for this reason changes our outlook from what can we receive this holiday season – to what can we give this holiday season.

The speaker in this passage is Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, just after he regained his voice after being silenced by an angel for 9 months for his disbelief. He begins singing a song of praise to God – a song of praise to God for delivering him. And Zechariah was praising God for more than giving him his voice back – he was praising God for all the mighty works that he had done. He was praising God for bringing salvation from their enemies and all who hate them.

Who was Zechariah seeking salvation from? The Jews were looking for deliverance from the hands of the Romans. And Zechariah is singing this song of praise for he knows that God has repeatedly delivered the Jewish people from the hands of their oppressors – the Egyptians, the Babylonians and Assyrians, and now the Romans. He knows that God had made a covenant with the Hebrew people that they would be God’s people, and that the Lord God would be their God. And due to the visitation of the angel to himself, he knows that his newborn son, the one we know as John the Baptist, would be the one who would prepare the way for the coming of the messiah, Emmanuel, God with us. Now, even though Zecharaih thanked God for sending the one who would forgive our sins, I’m not sure he knew what all that meant. But he trusted in God and gave thanks for what God was going to do even before he saw that happen. He thanked God for what he was doing for all people, not just for himself.

What is standing in the way of our being the disciples that God calls us to be and trusting in God as Zechariah does so that we may minister Christ’s love to our neighbors at Christmas rather than simply reducing our celebration of Christ’s coming by exchanging gifts and possibly having a beautiful and enjoyable feast with those closest to us? What things do we need to be freed from this Christmas season that we may truly serve God this Christmas? So this Advent season, I challenge you to trust in Christ and be freed from the desire to have that perfect Christmas we’ve always wanted receiving the perfect gift and having that flawless Christmas feast. I challenge you to free yourself from going into debt to pay for the perfect gift for children or loved ones this Christmas season and share the message of God’s love and hope with those in our lives who need hope and acceptance. I challenge you to free yourself from slavery to overbooked schedules and lengthy gift lists to experience God’s grace for yourself.

• Bowling

Tomter said the explanation he received is reflected in the Rec Center master plan prepared for the City in June 2009. The master plan also notes: "At one time there were several bowling leagues and the alley was active every night.... The bowling alley officially closed in August of 2003, however it had been years since any leagues or teams flourished. An attempt in 2001 to start a league failed."

Tomter presented information to counter the master plan's statements that parts are not available and that no one in Nome can maintain the equipment. Ten other Nomeites expressed strong interest in restoring the bowling alley instead of demolishing it.

Tomter said he had learned that parts are widely available by Googling "Brunswick," the equipment supplier for the Rec Center bowling alley. He said the bowling alley was vibrant when it had a restaurant and was well maintained. "We already own it and if we get rid of it, we won't have it again," he said. He emphasized the potential for use of the bowling alley by kids after school and by families.

"I've got ideas to get it to work," Tomter said. His ideas include hiring a manager certified to maintain the bowling alley at an annual salary of about $49,000, a rate specified for the vacant program assistant position at the Rec Center. Noting that bowling alley maintenance personnel were once paid $12 an hour, Tomter said he can't get anyone to work at his restaurant for that wage.

Turning to Wally Johnson, who had maintained the bowling alley for 13 years, Tomter asked if Johnson would consider resuming the work for $49,000. "Yes," Johnson replied.

"He's certified on the equipment, and it seems a huge benefit to the community if we look in that direction," Tomter said. A Brunswick representative recommended that Tomter contact Mark Nelson of Bowl Builders to evaluate the Rec Center bowling alley, according to e-mail correspondence Tomter provided to the council.

Tomter informed the council that Nelson recently replaced six A-2 pinsetters in perfect condition from Clear Air Force base and installed new models. The A-2 pinsetters will be stored at Fort Wainwright. Tomter said the City probably can obtain the pinsetters for little more than the cost of shipping them to Nome and they would last 30 years. He suggested that the City bring Nelson to Nome next week for two full days at a cost of $4,000 to inspect the bowling alley and determine what it would cost to repair it.

Support for bowling alley

Fred Moody said the city could use grant funds received for refurbishing the Rec Center to restore the bowling alley rather than tear it out. The facility could be used for recreation by kids after school, he added.

Lance Johnson, director of Nome Community Center, said he hopes city officials will make sure the bowling alley won't work before taking it away. "Teen activity is my interest," he said. He noted that teens have a new skate park at the Rec Center. He said supervision of youths at the bowling alley is important and he will be happy to discuss with the council the ways his agency can help.

Chris Busk, a teacher at Nome-Beltz High School, distributed a graph to council members showing strong support among students for making the bowling alley operational. Of 63 algebra students Busk polled, 43 strongly agreed and 13 agreed with the proposal. Busk said 20 teachers also support revitalizing the bowling alley. "It has educational value and monetary value," he noted. "Recreation is limited in Nome, and if you take away [the bowling alley], you are limiting our resources, especially in the cold, dark months."

Nelson] because I know the history behind the machines," he said.

In response to questions from Councilman Stan Andersen, Johnson said each Brunswick machine has 2,000 moving parts, the biggest concern is maintenance, and maintenance of the machines is a full-time job. "The Brunswick school certifies you to be capable for anything except a cracked housing," he said.

Andersen asked why interest in bowling had declined and whether league bowling dwindled after the restaurant closed down. Wally Johnson said the question is hard to answer, but possibly the mechanic who succeeded him could not keep the equipment running and bowlers became frustrated.

"It happened with the original bowling alley down the street," Andersen said. "A different generation came in and did not bowl."

"The people of Nome, especially children, should have an opportunity for other than basketball in the winter and softball in the summer," Wally Johnson replied. Others who spoke in support the bowling alley proposal were Mike Quinn, Paul Kosto, Russell Rowe, Mark Johnson, Jim Adams and Vicki Erickson.

Andersen, who presided at the meeting in the absence of Mayor Denise Michels, polled the council for responses to the public testimony. All agreed to review plans for the bowling alley in relation to questions and suggestions by those who testified at the meeting. Councilman Jon Larsen said he wished the issue had come up during the survey conducted a year ago to gather public input for the plan. Larsen and Councilman Jerald Brown attended the meeting by teleconference.

Councilwoman Mary Knodel asked City Manager Josie Bahnke to investigate bowling alley issues. Andersen told Bahnke the council is authorizing her to bring Mark Nelson to Nome to inspect the bowling alley at a cost of $4,000.

Knodel said she had received a call from a constituent who told her a man who is coming to Nome for the holidays has offered to inspect machines at the bowling alley for free on Dec. 26. It was decided to delay Nelson's trip to Nome until after that date.

The council postponed action on a resolution to accept a proposal for the Nome Recreation Center Phase II Project from Northwind Architects until a thorough evaluation of the bowling alley has been completed.

• Pool

"I'd like to see the money go there to finish the project and bring the pool up to snuff," said Councilwoman Mary Knodel. She later suggested that funds for added lighting at the skating rink and grass planting at the Rec Center ball fields be added to the City's general fund budget when it is amended in January.

The council accepted the resignation of Councilman Neal Foster, the newly appointed representative for District 39 in the Alaska House of Representatives.

In other action, the council approved an ordinance to allow Banner Wind Farm to sell energy into the Nome Joint Utility System grid by a 4-0 vote. Councilman Jerald Brown, who attended the meeting by teleconference, abstained from the vote due to a conflict of interest.

Utility Manager John Handeland said this amendment to the Nome Code of Ordinances Chapter 15 deals with alternative energy and increases the limit of total energy flowing from sources outside the system to 1.2 megawatts (1,200 kilowatts). "As [Chapter 15] was set up 20-plus years ago, no one thought this far ahead or as big and the amount of energy input to the system was limited."

The wind farm will receive pay monthly with the amount depending on how much money the power coming off the farm saved the utility in expenses.

During a public hearing prior to the vote, Erickson expressed support for the ordinance, saying he and the Nome Chamber of Commerce are strong supporters of renewable energy.

"I saw my name in the paper, so I figured I'd better show up," said Jim Adams, whose 5-kwh system is the only other outside source currently going into the grid. Handeland said there is room for other alternative energy producers under the new limit of 1,200 kilowatts.

The council unanimously adopted an ordinance affecting construction that incorporates into city law the most recent editions of the International Building, Mechanical, Residential and Uniform Plumbing and Fire codes. They replace codes for 2000.

The council approved resolutions to:

- Dispose of the City's right of reverter and reversionary interest in 50 lots of residential real property. The City retained a right of reverter and reversionary interest in the parcels from land sales in the early 1980s to assure that the deeded property was developed for residential purposes. The council is satisfied that the lots identified in the resolution were developed for those purposes.

- Authorize the city manager to execute a request for proposals for up to $30,000 to revise the Port Development Plan.

- Authorize the city manager to enter into an agreement for professional services with Bering Strait Development Co. for up to $30,000 to conduct technical energy audits on City facilities. Brown abstained from the vote due to a conflict of interest.

- Approved the design for the Nome-Beltz High School Building D and E roof replacement from Northwind Architects LLC.

The council approved a request for approval of the City's Rental, Use, Permit and Licensing Fee schedule for 2010; approved liquor license renewals for VFW Post No. 9569 and Nome Liquor Store; and approved a new liquor license application from Husky LLC.

The council said yes to Carl Emmons' request for a $2,000 contribution from the City to the Lions Club to supplement funds raised by the club for the annual New Year's Eve fireworks display at Center Beach.

Bahnke congratulated Nome Police Officer Nicholas Harvey who graduated from the Alaska law Enforcement Training Academy in Sitka Nov. 12.

Knodel noted the resignation of Irene Anderson from the Nome Planning Commission and thanked her for many years of service.

The council decided not to hold a regular meeting on Dec. 28 but to call a special meeting if the need arises.

Contract puts a price on wind

By Sandra L. Medearis

Banner Wind's 18 turbines churning atop Banner Ridge are in full operation with repairs completed. Also complete, pending final approvals, is a lengthy power sales agreement by which the alternative energy company can sell power to the Nome Joint Utility System grid. The pact is good for 20 years unless terminated by breach of performance by one party. The NJUS Board went over the pact at its Dec. 15 meeting.

According to the final agreement, delivery of power from the wind farm to NJUS will formally start its commercial operation on Christmas Day. Key points of the pricing scheme are these:

- From Dec. 25 through Dec. 31, 2011, NJUS will pay the initial rate of a straight 18 cents per kilowatt hour.
- Sets a limit on how much electricity NJUS will accept from Banner Wind

- After the initial period, NJUS will pay based on an electric power rate formula reflecting NJUS' previous year's fuel costs and fuel efficiency as reported to the Power Cost Equalization office, along with the effect of the annual Consumer Price Index.
- NJUS will pay a maximum of 23 cents and 13 cents at the minimum, even if the formula yields a price higher or lower than these, according to the contract.
- Every four months a utility consultant will analyze any loss of NJUS generation efficiency caused by the hookup.
- Banner Wind LLC will pay for work by NJUS caused by its connection to the wind farm, but not over $5,000 for any calendar year unless NJUS has provided a cost estimate and a justification for costs over the annual limit to Banner 10 days before starting

Rock Creek gaining the upper hand on water woes

Mine achieving drawdown behind tailings dam

By Tyler Rhodes

Despite being idled for more than a year in terms of producing gold, the Rock Creek Mine is still playing host to a workforce of 50 employees and contractors.

Outside of maintaining the stalled operation's facilities, the main task at hand for the crew at the mine just north of Nome is the ongoing effort to reduce the massive buildup of water behind its tailings dam. With its water treatment plant processing approximately 400 gallons a minute and feeding nearly 30 injection wells, it appears operator NovaGold may finally be turning the corner on drawing down the more than 50 million gallons of water that built up behind a dam that was never supposed to hold back so much liquid.

"We are very pleased with the progress that our Rock Creek team has made in bringing the Rock Creek mine site into environmental compliance," NovaGold President and Chief Executive Officer Rick Van Nieuwenhuyse said via e-mail. "We look forward to getting the excess water removed from behind the TSF [tailings storage facility] dam structure and to evaluating our plans going forward."

ing our plans going forward."

Jack DiMarchi of the Alaska Department of Natural Resource's Large Mine Permitting Team acknowledged that the company's effort has yielded good results and was meeting the department's expectations. DiMarchi said in less than a month, the mine was able to draw the pond down by approximately 13 million gallons of water. He said the water level measured 151.27 feet Nov. 15 and was down to 149.89 feet on Dec. 8. "This is good progress," he said.

The system to rid the storage facility of its overabundance of water is hinged on the performance of the 28 wells which inject water underground from the TSF after it passes through a treatment plant. Van Nieuwenhuyse said the system is now working well enough to abandon a plan the mine broached earlier this year to pipe its treated water all the way to Nome's sewage lagoons. That plan never advanced to the point where the City of Nome gave a final rejection or approval.

Van Nieuwenhuyse said the plan was dropped as Rock Creek was able to bring more of its injection wells online. "We evaluated this possibility further and decided that there were more viable alternatives to discharging water. Specifically, our injection well field is now working as designed and, we believe, will allow us to remove the excess water from behind the dam," he said.

Van Nieuwenhuyse added that since the dam basin is "V" shaped, the pace of the water level's lowering should accelerate as the injection wells continue their work. As of Dec. 14, Van Nieuwenhuyse said the water level was dropping at a rate

Auxiliary missing $8,500, former treasurer charged

By Tyler Rhodes

The former secretary and treasurer of American Legion Unit 19 Auxiliary is facing felony counts of theft, fraud and forgery for the alleged embezzlement of more than $8,500 from the service organization.

According to a complaint filed in the Second Judicial District Court, Linda Jo Kimoktoak allegedly used her role in the Auxiliary to funnel approximately $8,550 to herself through writing herself checks and making unauthorized ATM and bank withdrawals.

The Auxiliary's president, Theresa Kenick, refused to comment on any aspect of the case or the organization's finances.

Kimoktoak also declined to comment on the charges.

The Auxiliary is a women's organization that compliments the American Legion. Both are veterans service organizations. The local Auxiliary supports itself through a variety of fundraisers held throughout the year and provides assistance and support to veterans through a variety of projects and programs.

According to the complaint against Kimoktoak, a Nome Police Department investigation alleges the former secretary/treasurer used her position to make unauthorized ATM withdrawals to the tune of $1,600, write unauthorized checks to herself totaling $2,650 and make other unauthorized withdrawals of $4,300. The complaint claims Kimoktoak also presented unauthorized withdrawal slips for cash from the Auxiliary accounts held at Wells Fargo Bank.

Letters

To: Senators Lesil McGuire and Bill Wielechowski with copy to U.S. Senator Mark Begich, U.S. Senator Lisa Murkowski, U.S. Rep. Don Young, and Meera Kohler, AVEC Executive Director:

This is a response to your call to provide citizen’s feedback on the Draft State Energy Policy and Program Recommendations by Dec. 15. I’d like to provide some input on energy and other problems that have plagued the Wade Hampton area for many years. As stated in President Obama’s 2009 campaign theme, it is “Time for Change”.

When oil was first discovered in the North Slope, rural Alaskans were happy to anticipate purchasing fuel oil and gas at low cost; however, to our dismay the price was unexpectedly high. To this day it’s been increasingly rising, becoming a huge issue in recent newspaper headlines.

The current oil production is to have it first shipped to California refineries, shipped back to Alaska, distributed to retailers, then to the bush. This process is extremely expensive as the price of oil rises. Heating oil in Mountain Village is $6/gallon and gasoline is $5.62/gallon.

Please note there is a refinery at North Pole, AK. As the world-wide recession hit the country affecting all types of businesses, I read this refinery was shut down due to financial losses in attempts to produce jet fuel for air cargo carriers. Should the refinery owners agree this refinery can be reopened with bulk holding facilities to meet energy needs at a reasonable cost and lessening financial hardships for rural residents? Should that happen it would mainly benefit the entire Yukon/Tanana region including entities, utility companies, etc. who depend heavily on gas for transportation, oil to heat buildings, etc., creating a win-win situation for everyone. Regulating organizations will need to be involved, as we all know.

As a 79-year-old elder I am giving my little input about this very important issue instead of complaining or asking for more welfare needs. Something must be done for this area of the state. Speaking of elders— we no longer harness our dogs to get a sled load of firewood. Our fixed income is based on what we have, but we are still thankful for it. I sincerely appreciate your efforts to develop strategies to benefit all Alaskans and going as far as asking private citizens’ input.

On behalf of all Alaskans I wish the legislature best wishes for a successful session. I encourage the legislature to practice good stewardship of our state funds. God bless you all. Respectfully, Andrew Brown, Sr.

Dear Editor,
Looking at the world today the United States has become one of the most, if not the most policed country. We no longer are allowed to honestly write or say what we want, censorship. New laws are only there to stop others from becoming successful in life. Honest businesses are attacked when honestly helping the people. Remember the attack on NSEDC when they found a way to help us lower the cost of fuel, unlike their Denali Commission’s RUBA or some other name that was formed to find ways to save on our heating fuel.

Now we have this healthcare debate going on in Congress. If it passes, I believe our health will be in jeopardy. Look at all the indigenous people of the world. They never used to get sick until they got “westernized”.

Cancer has been an ongoing goal to cure in the medical industry. Their success rate of curing it is about two percent while the natural herbs cure rate is over ninety percent (naturalcures.com). When you deprive a living cell of oxygen for forty-eight hours, it becomes cancerous. (naturalcures.com). If the new healthcare bill passes, the natural remedies will be in their control because the proposed healthcare bill will mean a global healthcare regulation system (globalinformation-network.com) Because the FDA does not recognize natural remedies as cures, most or all natural cures are being done outside of the United States. How many of your readers know that it is criminal to cure a person with natural remedies? In California, a lady was jailed for five years for curing her fourteen-year-old son of cancer with natural remedies. Look at “Magic Johnson”. We all know he had AIDS. The medical industry says there is no cure for it. He went overseas and got cured.

The public is numbed down through additives/preservatives in the food. They took Phonics out of the school system so that we will not be able to read. In religion, ninety percent of the helpful information is left out of sermons, a former pastor friend told me. They have a curriculum just like the schools. Jesus was always teaching about love. Read the bible as a historical document and you will see what I mean.

Sound Off

By Sue Steinacher

NEST (Nome Emergency Shelter Team) would like to clarify to the community and to our guests how we operate.

No one gets paid; all the workers, coordinators and cooks are volunteers. The shelter is only opened if the night temperature is predicted to be –10°F or colder, or –20°F or colder with wind chill because this is when people are at greatest risk to exposure, and because there are not enough volunteers to be open more often.

The Church of the Nazarene does not run the shelter. They graciously donate the space and are reimbursed for their expenses. Other organizations have donated needed supplies, and the volunteers come from across the community.

The shelter opens at 10 p.m. and everyone must be up and out, with the church cleaned, by 7 a.m., so that volunteers can get to their regular jobs. Guests assist with setting-up and cleaning up, and are always very appreciative.

We are in the process of incorporating as a non-profit organization, and are currently applying for grants that would allow us to hire some staff assistance. We are also seeking a more permanent location for next winter.

More volunteers are needed, especially for the 2 am – 7 am shift. For more information, or to offer a few hours of your time on a cold night, please e-mail nomesteam@gmail.com or call Abby Huggins at 304- 2898, or Sue Steinacher at 443-7673.

No Place Like Nome for the Holidays

We live in a fantastic town. It’s home, it’s Nome. We welcome back our students who have been away at school. Meetings at the Nome airport are especially warm at this time of year when family and friends make it home for the holidays.

Let’s be of glad spirits this year as we head into a tough winter. The economy is rough. We have flu viruses to worry about, high fuel bills and the concern to go with making our fuel bills soar till they pop. We have a lot to contend with, but what an interesting time to live in Nome.

We have a town with spirit. Let’s be glad and enjoy the warmth of good neighbors and friends. Merry Christmas and Happy New Year.

Native and environmental groups challenge Shell drilling decision, state rebukes

In a statement issued last Friday, Governor Sean Parnell vowed to continue to fight to protect jobs and resource development in Alaska as he requested the state's attorney general to file a motion to intervene in the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals to uphold a federal decision allowing Shell to proceed with exploration for offshore oil. Parnell's statement said that several environmental groups challenged the decision by the Minerals Management Service to open the Chukchi Sea to oil drilling.

However, it was the Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission and the Inupiat Community of the Arctic Slope who first submitted the appeals to overturn Shell's drilling plan. At a later point, the locals were joined by environmental groups in the appeal. The groups claim that the Mineral Management Service did not properly evaluate the effects of the proposed drilling, including the risk of an oil spill. The state countered with an intervention to maintain that the federal agency adequately considered the impacts of oil drilling on the Arctic ecosystem and subsistence activities. Parnell said that oil development at the outer continental shelf would be critical to the state's economic future.

The state's attorneys have been intervening in several cases in which economic development was at stake, including litigation involving the Outer Continental Shelf and the Kensington Mine. On Thursday, the state filed a motion to intervene in a lawsuit challenging the federal National Marine Fisheries Service's decision not to list the ribbon seal as threatened under the Endangered Species Act. Under the legal theory that a warming climate endangers the existence of ice-dependent animals, the Center for Biological Diversity and others have petitioned to list ice seals and the polar bear under the endangered species act.

Polar bears were listed as a threatened species last year. Once a species is listed, environmental restraints on developments in their habitats become more regulated and restricted. This runs counter to the state's priority of resource and economic development. Governor Parnell's Fiscal Year 2011 budget includes funding for an additional attorney at the Department of Law specifically to handle only ESA issues, as well as $800,000 for outside counsel to take on ESA-related work on the state's behalf.

Road to Nome could get more funds

Last week Alaska Governor Sean Parnell unveiled his FY 2011 budget proposal and included $1 million for continued work on the Western Access Study, or the study to blaze a road to Nome. The Department of Transportation is in its last weeks of completing a year-long study to identify costs and a potential route. A report was supposed to be out by December, but has been postponed and it will be published in January 2010.

Millrock announces exploration agreement with Kinross for Council

Despite dropping the prospect at Divide, Millrock Resources still has interests in the Bering Strait region. Last week, the exploration company announced that it is about to enter an exploration agreement with Kinross Gold Corporation which includes mining claims near Council. Millrock has an agreement on the Council land block with the Bering Straits Native Corporation. Millrock had staked surrounding lands to form a large land package. Millrock and Kinross plan to do an initial drill test in summer of 2010.

Salmon Lake land selection nears conveyance

Clearing one of the last hurdles before being conveyed to the Bering Straits Native Corporation, a Senate committee ratified the Salmon Lake Land Selection Resolution Act last week. The bill ratifies a settlement between the state of Alaska, the Bureau of Land Management and the Bering Straits Native Corporation completing land conveyances promised in the 1971 Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act. The act was OK'd by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee last week. Sen. Lisa Murkowski, the ranking Republican on the committee said that with passage of this bill the issues that have complicated land and wildlife management would be left behind and that the corporation's shareholders would finally realize the economic and cultural benefits of their land. The bill now must be passed by the full U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives before being signed into law by the president.

work and receiving a signature.

- The two power producers will pay each other monthly, including power purchased from NJUS by Banner Wind when the winds are calm, for example.
- Banner Wind LLC will receive any benefits or advantages from the development, construction, operation and maintenance of the alternative energy source.

Meanwhile, NJUS is working with Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. to explore long-term membership in the NSEDC Consolidated Bulk Fuel Program to save money on power generation through cheaper fuel. NJUS has already used the lower interest and lower price afforded by the program to save dollars on 1 million gallons or so purchased to top off tanks when fuel prices went down this fall. NJUS manager John K. Handeland and NSEDC executives signed the finance agreement for this fuel Nov. 24, saving the utility at least $70,000 over commercial financing. According to NJUS, the transaction lowered the surcharge on ratepayers’ electric bills from 18.01 cents to 16.93 cents per kWh.

NJUS currently buys diesel fuel for its generators through the Western Alaska Fuel Group. Consultants are penciling out the costs to find the best deal for future purchases.

That contract notes that NSEDC and NJUS want to look at the potential benefits to Nome residents and other bulk fuel program member communities if Nome added its big demand to the current consolidated purchasing power to reduce high energy costs in the region.

NSEDC has already put out the welcome mat for NJUS participation in next year’s fuel purchase. The program is restricted to entities with bulk fuel storage capacity and U.S. Coast Guard-approved fuel transfer equipment, and must be a municipal or tribal government, a local fuel vendor or a Native corporation. Organizations have to be paid up for the 2009 purchase by Jan. 4. NSEDC, a non-profit, does not mark up the fuel price.

“NSEDC views this program as an opportunity to further economic development in the region,” NSEDC Vice President and CEO Janis Ivanoff told NJUS in her letter. “By acting as a central point for the administration of fuel orders and backing purchases for fuel with its credit, NSEDC is working to do its part in helping Norton Sound communities cope with the high cost of fuel.”

Overdue payments would collect interest at 10 percent per annum. Also, NSEDC charges each participant a proportionate share of administrative expenses—legal fees and value of staff time—based on the number of gallons bought by the program member.

In other business, board members received an extensive report on water and sewer system work completed in the 2009 season, which included total water main installed, 22,750 feet; total sewer main installed, 500 feet; total force main installed, 1,100 feet.

Proposed water and sewer activities for 2010 include:

- Water and sewer master plan update
- Complete Sixth Avenue pump house upgrades
- Bypass Road utilities and service to the new NSHC hospital
- Moonlight Springs water transmission main upgrades
- Gold Avenue water main construction.

• Rock Creek

of a foot every two to three weeks.

Injection wells were not the only tool Rock Creek pulled out of the bag in its effort to remove water from behind the dam. In the fall before the cold weather set in, large water guns were used uphill from the dam to disperse the water and allow it to drain back into the ground. As the days dipped below freezing, the guns took on the appearance of snow-making equipment, painting the hillside with a wide swath of white. “[We] do plan to re-start when the weather warms up next spring as this was an efficient way of dispersing excess water in the system,” Van Nieuwenhuyse said.

NovaGold’s work on the TSF has not been limited to the water. The mining firm has also focused on the outside structure of the dam. “We added another layer of material in front of the Tailings Storage Facility (TSF) dam structure as an extra precaution to ensure long-term dam safety,” Van Nieuwenhuyse wrote. “There is some minor additional work actively going on to widen the working area on the dam face, and we have completed a number of monitoring wells and installed various monitoring equipment to monitor dam safety.”

The dam was originally designed to hold the tailings, the waste material after the gold is separated from the ore, which were to be about 65 percent solid and 35 percent water. The system was designed for the water to evaporate out of the impoundment. Aided by a couple of winters with considerable snowfall that were followed by significant runoff, the dam collected much more water than was originally permitted and planned.

Whether NovaGold’s buttressing of the dam will be sufficient for its future use will be the goal of a DNR study. “DNR is working with the mine to see that certain aspects of the dam’s past performance are addressed in the next few months and before the TSF is used for tailings disposal again,” DiMarchi said. “Basically there is a program being crafted to monitor the dam (settling, temperature, water levels) through the winter and then complete a geotechnical program to collect more data from the bedrock below the dam next summer to come up with some conclusions about the suitability of the original design or construction, any changes to the permafrost under the dam, and to characterize the bedrock conditions that might have contributed to the higher-than-expected seepage rates.”

DiMarchi said the program may result in additional modifications being required of the dam or it may find that the current design is sufficient.

Van Nieuwenhuyse said getting the tailings facility back to a state where it could again support a producing mine will be necessary before NovaGold decides whether or not it will seek to restart operations at Rock Creek. “We are continuing to gather information related to a possible re-start of the operations; however, our first priority is to remove the excess water from behind the dam,” he said. “No re-start can occur until the water is removed. We will be addressing this during our 2010 budget plans.” NovaGold stopped work toward production in November 2008.

Van Nieuwenhuyse was also non-committal on whether NovaGold has been in negotiations to sell off portions of its Nome area holdings that do not include the Rock Creek operation. “We have been approached by several parties who have expressed interest in several of the business ventures ongoing on Alaska Gold lands,” he said. “We are under confidentiality and therefore it would be inappropriate to comment further.”

Running ahead of the runoff

As winter just starts, Van Nieuwenhuyse said Rock Creek is already preparing for the spring breakup. Van Nieuwenhuyse said work has been conducted and is continuing on and around three drainage channels installed at the mine site. The work is aimed at reducing sediment making its way into the naturally flowing waterways in the area.

“We have built a significant structure to manage water at the out-flow of Drainage Chanel No. 1 (DC No. 1 or upper-most channel to collect and manage storm water) as well as completed significant placement of liners and rip rap and vegetative re-seeding to ensure minimal run-off of turbid water from the mine site,” he said. He said similar work is occurring at the other two drainage channels.

Van Nieuwenhuyse said work will continue on the storm water prevention aspects of the operation for the next six weeks. The state will be watching the results of that work when this year’s snowfall returns again to liquid. “The test will be the quality of their runoff this spring,” DiMarchi said.

High levels of sediment in the water, known as turbidity, discharged from the mine site into area creeks in the past have proved costly for Rock Creek. In May NovaGold agreed to pay the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency more than $880,000 for fines related to storm water discharges into Rock, Lindblom and Glacier creeks from April 2007 to September 2008. The EPA faulted the company for what it described as unchecked runoff as well the lack of an adequate prevention plan to deal with such runoff. The fine was one of the largest levied for a general permit in the four states that make up the EPA’s Region 10.

The complaint states that Kimoktoak held the secretary/treasurer position from March 2006 to April 2007. Kimoktoak faces charges of second-degree forgery, fraudulent use of access device and second-degree theft. All three are felonies.

According to the police report, officer Byron Redburn spoke with Kimoktoak in October this year at which time she admitted owing the Auxiliary a substantial amount of money and agreed to pay it back.

Kimoktoak made a felony first appearance before Magistrate Bradley Gater Dec. 3 and was scheduled for a preliminary hearing Dec. 22. Public defender Kirsten Bey asked that the hearing be continued having just received discovery in the case. The hearing was reset for Jan. 5 at 1:30 p.m. before Gater.

Mukluks, midnight mass and Eskimo games

Francis Alvanna, 69, spent his early years on the isolated King Island. Before he came to Nome for his high school years in the early 1950s, he remembers the Christmases he celebrated with the community on the Island.

"Every year we would go to the schoolhouse and watch a play," he said. The schoolhouse was the largest building on the small island—big and white. The play was the same each year, the priest's own spin on Christmas. Mary and Joseph's costumes were made from sheets, while the shepherds' were made from burlap bags. Francis was a shepherd. There were also about 30 sheep played by younger children. People would go watch in their brand new mukluks and new parkas they got every Christmas.

At home they each had a traditional American stocking, and his was full of candies and crayons. At midnight, they would attend Mass.

Francis referred to Rie and Juan Muñoz's book, The King Island Journal, in which he's featured a couple times in photographs as a child. He remembers their years on the island and the 1951 Christmas described. The couple generously wrapped 150 gifts for students, ages five to 19, and made fruitcakes for several families.

Francis also remembers a Christmas dinner that the whole island contributed to. In the Muñozes' book, Juan talks about how Rie made a baked spaghetti dinner for more than 150 people. Others brought bread and Eskimo ice cream containing berries, salmon eggs, reindeer fat and seal oil, of which Juan said he could only swallow "with the help of a large piece of bread, and many mouthfuls of coffee."

The day after Christmas, the village gathered in the evening for Eskimo dancing. For the rest of the days until New Year's, the kids competed in Eskimo games.

Nowadays Francis spends Dec. 25 with his wife, Edna, his seven grown kids and still attends the midnight mass.

MEMORIES—Francis Alvanna points out a picture of him as a young boy in The King Island Journal as he reminisces of Christmases past.

Over the river and through the woods in Unalakleet

They had community carolers, a big live tree cut fresh from the country and hauled in on a sled by snowmachine or dog team, but for Amber Bradley, Christmas in Unalakleet was about grandparents and family.

"I remember so much about going over to my Grandpa Shacky and Laurina Ryan's house. We had a big huge Christmas dinner, almost as big as Thanksgiving," Amber said. "My favorite was the turkey stuffing. There was my mom, Karen Bradley, my dad, Fred Ryan Jr., and my five siblings."

They were lucky that her grandparents had a present for them to open on Christmas day, Amber said.

"On Christmas Eve we would get to open one present, but always ended up opening all our presents—socks, clothing and Barbies," she said. "We tried to save at least one, but that never happened."

As a child, the Christmas tree was almost as important to her as the presents.

"Most people had a real live Christmas tree. I love the smell of the pine needles. My favorite part was decorating it. We had fun making decorations. One time we made little beaded felt hearts or Christmas tree shapes that were frames for pictures," Amber remembered. "Once I made a big Santa with cotton and a paper suit colored red. That sticks in my memory."

The family always watched Christmas movies. One movie was very educational in teaching her a lesson.

"When I was about 7 years old, we watched 'The Christmas Story.' Something that happened in there influenced me to try putting my tongue on a cold metal boat. I thought maybe my tongue wouldn't stick," Amber laughed. "I had to test it, but it did. I was outside alone. I had to pull it off, and it was cut."

Christmas day might hold ice-skating on the Unalakleet River near the house.

On the way to visit other folks, the family would stop by the home of her maternal grandparents, Ransom and Annabelle Bradley, to visit and give presents.

Amber Bradley said she strongly believes in Santa Claus.

Erna enjoys homegrown Christmas

By Sandra L. Medearis

Erna Rasmussen's homespun Christmas unfolded on a small family farm in the mountains of Norway where hard work put the Christmas dinner on the table.

"Most of our presents were knitted or crocheted," Erna laughed, telling her tale over the dining room table in her home on Fourth Avenue. "If anyone got a purchased present from the store, that was wonderful!"

"My older sister Ingeborg [Handeland] and my mother, Amanda, knitted all kinds of things—curtains, tablecloths, almost everything we needed was made at home. Mother clipped the wool, washed it, carded it and spun it into yarn. Then we made what we needed. I must have learned to knit the same time I learned to walk."

The family—mom, dad, three daughters and four sons—provided their food from their farm—potatoes from the garden patch, meat from cows and sheep they raised, clothing from the sheep, chickens and eggs, nut and fruit trees. They cranked butter in a churn.

"That was hard work. Your arm got very tired," Erna laughed.

From such hard work came their bountiful holiday dinner, the center of the Christmas Eve family celebration.

"The big celebration was always Christmas Eve, and it was for just the cozy family of the household," Erna said. "Every business closed at 2 p.m. On Christmas Day, we had church and parties with the extended family. The second day we had more parties with extended family and relaxation. It was very nice. The third day we went back to regular activities."

The tree came in the door Christmas Eve, selected by her brothers from the countryside of spruce trees standing among the birches.

One of the best parts, Erna remembers, was when they would carefully move the tree away from the wall so everyone in the family could join hands to walk around the tree singing carols. That wasn't all. They played games, too.

"That was always the tradition," Erna said.

Then came time for "white mush."

"We called it 'white mush.' You would call it "rice pudding. Whoever found the almond hidden in the pudding won a piece of marzipan," Erna said.

The family had to take extra caution in moving the tree when she was small, as the home didn't have electricity, so her mother clipped small candles onto the branches for lights.

Spareribs starred in the Christmas Eve feast. There were blueberries, cranberries and currants from summer trips to their cabin where they gathered grass for hay while the sheep grazed open range on the hillside. Fruit juice, potatoes and other vegetables came from the root cellar.

We would butcher lambs and cows, put them in salt brine, then hang them in the loft upstairs to drip and dry," Erna said. "The meat, the spareribs were so wonderful when you cooked them in the oven!"

When Erna was younger, the Christmas festivities never flowed along without interruption.

"One of my brothers or my father, Aadne, would suddenly remember that the cows needed more hay or something else needed to be tended in the barn. They would go out," Erna grinned.

"A few minutes later, Santa would barge in and drop a big burlap bag off his shoulder onto the floor. We children never caught on."

maximum temperature rise to below 2° Celsius; the commitment to list developed country emission reduction targets and mitigation action by developing countries for 2020; $30 billion short-term funding for immediate action until 2012 and $100 billion annually by 2020 in long-term financing, as well as mechanisms to support technology transfer and forestry. The accord was reached between the U.S., China, India, Brazil and South Africa. Many developing countries and climate change activists were disappointed with the non-binding outcome and the mere recognition of the accord by 193 nations. During the UN conference chaos ensued as many non-governmental organizations were expelled from the climate talks and thousands of people demonstrated outside the conference venue, demanding climate justice.

In reactions, Alaska Sen. Lisa Murkowski called the climate deal an "economically damaging climate action non-starter" and said in a statement that despite the Senate majority's failure to prioritize a climate bill ahead of the negotiations in Copenhagen, the past two weeks have made clear that domestic legislation would not resolve the full range of fundamental, international disagreements. She took an isolationist's approach to global climate change and said that this matter must be addressed in a way that strengthens the US economy and bolsters the American energy security. She said the American climate policy needs to stand on its own because it would be the right approach for the country, regardless of the actions other nations do, or do not, take.

The non-binding and non-committal nature of the accord also drew criticism from environmental groups. Kieran Suckling, executive director of the Center for Biological Diversity, said that merely acknowledging the weaknesses of the deal does not excuse its failings. Suckling warned that humankind stands at the precipice of climatic tipping points beyond which a climate crash will be out of anybody's control. He said the only hope that flows from Copenhagen stems from the birth of a diverse global movement demanding real solutions and climate justice.

Denali commission has new federal co-chair

U.S. Commerce Secretary Gary Locke appointed Alaskan Joel Neimeyer as the federal co-chair of the Denali Commission. Neimeyer is a former program manager for the Alaska Native Tribal Health Consortium to the Denali Commission and will be the first Alaska Native to serve as head of the commission. The Denali Commission is a federal-state partnership designed to provide critical utilities, infrastructure and support for economic development in Alaska by delivering federal services in the most cost-effective manner possible.

The Denali Commission operates hundreds of projects in rural communities across the state. A civil engineer, Neimeyer has worked as a program officer through the Alaska Native Tribal Health Consortium and as an environmental health officer for the Indian Health Service. He is active in civil affairs in Anchorage as president of the Anchorage Neighborhood Health Center Board and is a board member of the United Way. Neimeyer starts work at the Denali Commission on January 3. Sen. Mark Begich recommended Neimeyer to the Obama administration. George Canellos held the post prior to Neimeyer.

Inge tells of Norwegian-Nome Traditions

They would sing around the tree

By Reba Lean

On a cold December day, Ingeborg Handeland, 86, can be found inside her cozy yellow house with a tin of Norwegian sand cookies and recalling her earlier Christmases in both Sirdal, Norway and Nome.

"We didn't have Santa Claus in Norway when I was growing up," she said. Instead, on Christmas mornings, she and her siblings would receive a present from their parents. Inside the present was always a clothing item, "new mittens or new socks most of the time." Nevertheless, Christmases were memorable and Ingeborg can recollect all the way back to age three.

In 1953, the Handelands came to Nome. Ingeborg and her husband Kai were brand new to the American ways of Christmas and she remembers that first year. In a house across from the now-XYZ Center, "We put our tree in the middle of the floor, and it was just me and my husband. We just walked around the tree and held hands and sang our Norwegian Christmas songs."

Seven years later, their son John was born, and then Arne in 1962, and finally Linda in 1963. Their children's early Christmases were spent in the American tradition with a Norwegian twist. "Then we knew about Christmas because then we had lived in America. We knew about presents and we knew about Christmas parties." But still, her son Arne said, they would celebrate with a few tricks learned in Norway. For their Christmas feast, it was primarily Norwegian food like the potato dish called lefse that all the kids really seem to love, and a prune and apricot pudding. Most presents were opened on Christmas Eve, he said, "It was more exciting than Christmas."

BEAUTIFUL CATHEDRAL—Oscar Contreras shows the large church, Jesus de Milagros, that was the center of activities in his enviable story of Christmas celebrations in El Salvador

Watch out for Torito!

By Sandra L. Medearis

Oscar Contreras is standing behind the bar at Airport Pizza, talking to folks. Happy memories animate his face. His eyes flash as they reflect the Christmas Eve fireworks in the plaza. He puts his arms out, moose-rack wide, and steps side to side. Torito, all dressed up in his disguise, is running around the cobblestones and after young Oscar right now, the same way he waved his fireworks and ran after squealing kids in Contreras' native El Salvador years ago.

Oscar's audience leans forward into the drama of his Christmas story. They can hear the guitars, smell the cypress trees, hear the feet dancing in the square in front of the cathedral, feel the warm air on the arms of parents sitting on benches in short-sleeved shirts.

"We went to church first, Midnight Mass, then everyone went into the plaza for feasting, dancing, playing music. The whole town got together in the park, all night long. Everyone was waiting for Torito, the little bull. He ran around like lightning, like he was on fire with fireworks. It was the same guy for many years," Oscar said, speaking of men who traditionally put on cages covered with fireworks and charge at the crowd.

"We had turkey and special bread in long loaves baked for that night. The women had been baking for the families, for the neighbors. There were lights all over the church and many, many Christmas trees," Oscar said. "Religion was strong. The other churches joined us at Jesus de Milagros, our big, big cathedral. There were little gifts for all the kids. The community got together and really took care of the kids. It was all about sharing and taking turns. It was a good time for everybody. All our arguments were forgotten."

Taking turns?

"You go to the church and they give you a day. You are so glad when your family gets their day. On your day before Christmas, everyone comes to your house," Oscar explained. "Everyone meets at the church and then walks in a body to the house where it is their turn. They open their doors and everyone goes in at once. We share our food. We celebrate. We talk. If a family doesn't have enough, the community and the church take all the food to the house"

Where in El Salvador?

"The town is Coatepeque, but it doesn't matter. It is the same all over Central America—Panama, Nicaragua, Guatemala, Costa Rica, El Salvador—we all have that same culture, that same celebration," Oscar said.

A Seward Peninsula Outing

By George Schofield,
Class of 1917

Another Christmas treat from the archives of the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum. This article originally appeared in "The Aurora, '13" the yearbook published by the students of the Nome High School for the year 1912-1913 in Nome, Alaska.

The trip to Pilgrim Hot Springs in 1912 involved the use of a pupmobile drawn by a dog team on the old railroad tracks up the trail to the north of Nome along the route of the present day Kougarak Road. The trip was made by Frank Karrer, George Schofield, Hilda Johnson, Elizabeth Neuman and Harold Lyle (uncle of Donna Lyle Morgan).

All photos accompanying this story are from the Frank Karrer Collection at the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum. Frank Xavier Karrer was the superintendent, principal and teacher at the Nome High School from 1911 to 1914. The photo collection was given to the people of Nome by Frank Karrer's niece, Joan Karrer Boose in 2002. Museum notes or comments are italicized in parenthesis.

The advanced stage of twentieth century civilization makes it easy for the man of the city and the plains to follow the "call of the wild." He has but to board a steamer or train to be, within a few hours, in the heart of the wilderness, or to take his touring car or motor cycle and in a short time leave behind him the noises of the city.

Traveling in Seward Peninsula is quite different, for there the dog is indeed "man's best friend," ready at any hour of the day or night to start on a long mush at the call of his master.

Oh! for the joys of a ride in a dogmobile, with its intelligent motive power! Who would not prefer it to the automobile? No speed limits, leaking tanks, punctured tires, and the other griefs of the automobilists.

On the tenth of August last [1912], a party from Nome started for an outing at the Kruzamapa Hot Springs [now known as Pilgrim Hot Springs]. Their dogmobile was a small flat car about four feet by seven feet, drawn by a string of bird dogs and malamutes. They started about eight o'clock on a sunny morning with just enough snap in the air to be invigorating. The dogs tugged at their lashes, eager to go, and the crowd piled on at the word from the driver and we're off in a mad rush across the tundra to the foot hills; past the famous Little Creek and Bessie pay-streaks, then steadily up, up, up over the foot hills, and down again into the valleys, between mountains along the sides of which could be traced mile after mile of ditches used for mining purposes; across trestles in the neglected road which hung in mid-air, held together only by fish plates, where the well trained dogs, unhitched from the car by the driver, Floyd Wheeler, jumped from the track, ran around the wash-out, and were again hitched to the car, all without a stop or a perceptible slackening of the speed. At noon they stopped for lunch at the U.S. Road House, [also known as Dorothy Creek Roadhouse] thirty miles from Nome, and the dogs were seemingly as fresh as in the morning and the passengers, after satisfying their hunger, were eager for another ride. Night found the tired but enthusiastic crowd at the Iron Creek Road House where they declared they had the best meal of their lives, on game and fish cooked to the hunter's taste.

The next morning they were off early and found it just as interesting as the first day. From Iron Creek there was a change in the scenery for they were traveling around the Coast Range, the Sawtooth Mountains, whose majestic tops were covered with snow even in the balmy August weather. The vegetation became larger and the bare iron-stained sides of the mountains showed many colored in the sun light. The road-bed grew worse, the washout deeper, and in places there were glaciers on the track which the passengers had to walk around, and places where the ties were entirely gone, but the dogs pulled cheerily on. At noon the party reached Cottonwood and the end of their dogmobile ride. From there they were taken down the Kruzamapa River by the natives.

The rabbits and foxes ran out and took peeks at the strange intruders, and from every direction could be heard the songs of birds. After traveling eleven miles of such a winding river between mountain peaks so constantly changing their direction that it was impossible to believe they were the same range, the weary travelers landed on the bank of the river and after a walk of a quarter of a mile were at the Springs. And oh! those trees. After living for years where there are none it was like the first sight of a long absent friend. Some said they felt like hugging the trees. They found their sojourn at the Springs all and more than they had anticipated; with a comfortable log house to live in; delightful and rejuvenating hot mineral baths; long walks among the trees; hunting and picking berries; fishing in the many lakes; rowing on the river; and building bon-fires in the evening around which they told stories; sang songs and toasted marshmallows; so that when the three weeks had expired and it was time to return home no one wanted to go.

The trip back on the dog car had lost none of its attractions, and as the hunting season had opened, there was added excitement. The two leaders were trained bird dogs, and as the car was flying along the leaders would suddenly stop and point and the hunters would get off and in a few minutes come back with a bag of game. By the time the car reached the road house the party had over fifty ptarmigan.

The whole trip was a pleasant one and one long to be remembered, and it ended as it had begun, but with a finishing touch of enjoyment. Upon reaching the top of the foot hills the dogs suddenly stopped and looked around at their master, who proceeded to unhitch them, and after putting the leaders on the car with the passengers, and leaving the others to follow, gave the car a push, and away it flew down the mountain side giving the passengers an exhilarating coast of over seven miles, landing them within a short ride of home. The unanimous vote was that the outing had been a success and they would go again.

The Hot Springs and Sawtooth Range

By Lillian Simson for the 1911
Aurora Yearbook

Yet another Christmas story from the archives of the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

Northward from Nome may be seen the low round-topped hills which are four miles back on the tundra. From the summit of these one can see a number of granite-peaked mountains that have the appearance of the tooth of a saw. From this appearance the Kigluaik Mountains received the name of Sawtooth. This range is 15 miles wide and 60 miles long.

Some of the peaks are capped with snow. This is the only place about Nome where there is "ice and snow, the year around."

Mt. Osborne, the highest peak on Seward Peninsula, is 4,700 feet high. The north side rises nearly 3,000 feet in a seemingly straight wall, which has evidently been made by volcanic action and looks as if it were polished. As it has many different kinds and colors of rock formation it makes one of the grandest and most impressive views of Alaska.

The Kruzemapa Hot Springs are 60 miles from Nome. The trip can be made in one day by dog team.

In the past as many as 100 people have been there at a time, but now the large hotel has been destroyed by fire and fewer people can be accommodated.

They are near the Pilgrim River, which flows north and then west of them, where it empties into the Kuzietriem River.

The springs, by which many people have been cured of their different ailments, through the health-giving properties of the water, bubble up from the sand in the same manner as other hot springs, even in the coldest weather the creek is open and the snow melted for a half mile around.

The soil for a considerable distance is warm. In some places by digging for about three feet, water is reached; in other places the ground is quite dry.

East of the hotel there is a garden of 12 acres and west of it is a potato-patch of four acres.

Four years ago 70 tons of the finest flavored turnips, rutabagas, cauliflower, radishes, lettuce, carrots and potatoes were raised there. The last few years the amount produced has not been so large.

Near the springs is a large grove of cottonwood trees, which are the largest on the Seward Peninsula. This is a very pleasing sight to the people of Nome, as there are no trees for many miles around, and cottonwood recalls a summer climate.

Near the springs, in the Pilgrim River that is very clear, grayling, trout, pike, salmon and whitefish are plentiful.

Rabbits and ptarmigan are also found in abundance.

In the winter, after the holiday season, many people of Nome find the period of recreation at the Kruzemapa Springs both pleasant and beneficial.

Unalakleet Sewing Circle auction yields record $22,000

Elders and children receive Christmas money from sale of handmade items

By Laurie McNicholas

Every Unalakleet elder, orphan and child in a single parent household received Christmas cards with gifts of cash early this month from members of the Sewing Circle, an organization dating back to 1887 when missionary Axel Karlson established the community's Covenant Church.

The cash gifts are proceeds from the annual Sewing Circle auction of handcrafted goods and other donated items held Nov. 27 in Unalakleet Schools' multipurpose room. This year's auction produced a record $22,000, reports Sewing Circle member Heidi Ivanoff.

"The auction was successful this

$18,000 at its auction, always held the day after Thanksgiving, members told The Nome Nugget in an interview last month during a meeting of the group hosted by Olga Oyounmick, wife of Covenant Church pastor Joel Oyounmick. "We collect 85 percent of it that night," Ivanoff said.

In addition to handmade products, Sewing Circle members said auction items have included donated berries, salmon strips, bread, Bering Air tickets and for fun one year, 20 pair of men's pants. Winning bidders pay for store-bought items immediately, but for handcrafted products the Sewing Circle may accept a down payment of one third of the amount bid on auction night. Giving buyers of handmade goods more time to pay helps the Sewing Circle obtain the best prices for them, Ivanoff explained.

"Not just the Sewing Circle makes things," she noted. "It's really a community-wide donating of handmade items. We provide supplies of cloth and yarn." She said most of the funds raised at the auction are distributed to elders and children a week after the auction. "The extra money after gifting elders and children goes for a variety of projects at the Unalakleet Covenant Church, including carpeting, renovations, roofing, etc.," she added. "We keep several hundred dollars in a kitty."

Other Sewing Circle members present at the meeting were Judie Katongan, Betty Oyounmick, Sarah Oyounmick and Annie Woods, president of the organization. Woods said her grandfather, Chief Nashalook, met Axel Karlson in St. Michael and invited him to come to Unalakleet.

"Karlson was on his way to Russia, but he had missed the boat and spent the winter in San Francisco," Woods explained. "He could not make it past St. Michael. My grandfather kept the missionary safe when he first came to Unalakleet. He kept him in his home." She said some Unalakleet residents were antagonistic toward Karlson at first.

Sewing Circle members credited Karlson's wife, Hanna, with helping to establish the organization in its early years.

Proceeds from the auction, which yielded a record $22,000, have been distributed as gifts of cash in Christmas cards to all Unalakleet elders, orphans and children in single parent households. year due to good attendance, a good selection of items and competitive bidding," Ivanoff noted. "The top selling item was a small beaded tapestry depicting a seal that went for over $2,000. That was the highlight of the evening as the bids just kept going up. We also had moose jerky, buckets of herring eggs on kelp and many home-baked items." She estimated attendance at a little less than 100 persons.

"The doors opened at 4 p.m. to accept donations and display the items," Ivanoff said. "Bidding started at 6:30 p.m. and we were done about 1 a.m. This year the auctioneers were Middy Johnson, Karl Erickson, Jim Egli, Dave Cunningham, Jeff Erickson and Herb Ivanoff."

Refreshments served midway through the evening included a cake baked by Sewing Circle treasurer Judie Kotongan, coffee and juice. Kotongan also made the seal tapestry. Members of the Sewing Circle sang a hymn translated into Inupiaq that their mothers used to sing. # By His Own Pen - The Story of the Discovery of Gold at Anvil Creek

By Jafet Lindeberg

A Christmas Gift from the archives of the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

Your museum, the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum, is fortunate to receive an abundance of donations every year. In early January 2009 the museum received a truly remarkable gift in the form of an original letter written by Jafet Lindeberg who, as one of the Three Lucky Swedes, discovered gold at Anvil Creek in September 1898. Let's let the e-mails written to the Museum provide the background.

January 13, 2009

Ms. Laura Samuelson, Would you be interested in a letter written by Jafet Lindeberg, written in 1951 describing the discovery of Nome. If you are I'd be happy to send you the letter he wrote to me when I was 10 years old.

Frank Cooper

January 13, 2009

Dear Frank,

Yes, we are very interested in Jafet's letter. Jafet Lindeberg was one of the founding fathers of Nome. He was responsible for giving us power and water. He was a generous man who lived here until about 1923. We admire him greatly.

Sincerely,

Laura Samuelson

January 14, 2009

Dear Laura,

My mother and father were friends of Jafet's. My father and Jafet were both miners and ran around with each other.

When I was in the fifth grade we were studying Alaska and my father wrote Jafet and asked if he would write a letter for me describing his experience.

As a child I met Jafet a few times but was too young to say I knew him.

I will send you the letter in the next couple of days. I have held it for 58 years, it will be good to know it is going somewhere that it will be appreciated.

It was good to hear from you

Sincerely,

Frank Cooper

The letter was gifted to the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum and the people of Nome by Frank Cooper. It was transcribed by Cussy Kauer for your reading pleasure. Please note that the transcription is not intended to be correct in grammar or spelling. A few corrections have been made (Golovin, Yukon). Mr. Lindeberg was Norwegian. His accent is often revealed in his written words.

LETTER OF APRIL 23, 1951 FROM JAFET LINDEBERG TO MASTER FRANCES COOPER

Written on letterhead belonging to Nevada Tungsten Corporation, Post Office Box 137, Mina, Nevada

April 23, 1951

Master Frances Cooper,

I have been informed that you are studying Alaska and its natural resources. Among which is the gold discovery in which I took part in 1898 about September. Gold had been discovered on the Seward Peninsula about 1872 but had not been considered in paying quantities. What is meant not in sufficient amount where a person alone or in company with others could earn an ordinary days wages or sufficient to warrant him or them to abandon further exploration of other areas where more remunerative alluvial deposits may exist.

My two partners and myself had explored for about a month in a district where gold was found in the Early spring of 1898 and named Council City a distance of 50 miles from Golovin Bay which was a trading settlement and missionary station at the entrance to Fish River. Council City became a small town with population of about 50 people and has remained up to date about the same.

On September 4, 1898 my associates and myself decided to explore the country further to the westward and as we had two small boats we loaded these two boats with supplies food and mining equipment and traveled down river to Golovin Bay and there found a larger boat which we repaired and reconditioned for our purpose to travel along the open coast westward.

We left Golovin Bay on the 12 of September 1898 and reached the first river as an entrance to a Lagoon in two days on the third day to a river which we afterward name Snake River Where we found it to be very crooked. We camped about 1/2 mile up this river and while preparing our dinner that we were very much in need I dug a hole on a sand bar as deep as my rubber boots permitted and panned some dirt from the bottom of the hole and found a few colors of gold but not sufficient to pay wages, only an indication that some place there may be more. Next morning early we packed up for further journey up the river which was shallow in places and it took us two days before we could see a creek about two miles away meandering to the river. There we unpacked again.

One of my partners Erick Lindblom and I started out to investigate this creek while John Brynteson our third partner stayed at the camp to make it permanent. We found fairly good prospect on this small creek which we then and there named Mountain Creek. The next day we started out early providing ourselves with mid-day meals and traveled over large area of hills Eric digging holes and panning. In most of the creeks we found gold that we considered was in paying quantities as the following days we located claim for ourselves and others from whom

THE THREE LUCKY SWEDES—Erik Lindblom, Jafet Lindeberg and John Brynteson. In his letter to a 10-year-old boy, Jafet writes, "He who works gains what he works for and that very little comes to the ones who only wants and expect to get things without work."

we had power of attornies. We named the creeks as well as the river, Some of the mountains and natural objects, the town Nome, also the Cape which protrudes out to Bering Sea. We called it Cape Noon and afterward changed the name to Cape Nome.

Anvil Creek was named from a rock which was visible for all of the creeks and resembled an Anvil. Snow Gulch was named from a Bank of Snow or a glacier which was still covering the lower end of the small gulch late in September. Moonlight Springs was named as it happened that we were late going back to our camp on Snake River and the moon was shining on the water in the spring, so it was named Moonlight Spring. Dry Creek was named appropriately because it was dry. Rock Creek was named because it was very rocky. Glacier Creek has a large bank of ice in the late September so we called it Glacier Creek.

After about a week's stay we returned to Golovin Bay Mission Station where we reported our discovery of gold to a few men only to be kept a secret until we had time to locate our claims according to law and form a mining district. That would take more than three men as a recorder had to be appointed and notices given and recorded. The Mission Station owned an 8 ton schooner that we wanted very badly, but the missionary wanted us to build him a school house and church before he would rent us the schooner. This we did in about five days as we hired help and the season was nearing close, ice would be forming on rivers and also on the ocean shores as well as on the bays.

October 9 1898 we had loaded our rented schooner and started out and in two days we again entered Snake River. This time we were eight of us and (illegible) we had unloaded the ship and pulled it up the river about 1500 ft.

The ice started forming on the river and the next morning the river was frozen over so we could walk on the ice. We were then 8 of us and began packing camp equipment and other supplies up to Anvil Creek where we built our main camp from which we traveled to different creek, measured the claims that had been located on our first trip the month before.

After the claims were measured and staked and placed on records according to United States mining laws and the regulation made by us who formed the Cape Nome mining district, we built "rockers" for washing gold or separating gold from gravel and sand. We worked with these primitive tools for about two weeks and produced about $2,000 in gold dust and small nuggets.

There after we began our journey back to Golovin Bay and St. Micheals, which was and is the port for the great Yukon River and the British town of Klondike. After arrival to St. Micheals we notified the outside world of our discovery. Great many prospectors came to Nome during the spring of 1899 and staked claims in the Nome mining district tho many of the prospectors did not believe that there was any placer gold in that area and left for parts unknown.

During the late spring and early summer of 1899 gold was discovered in the beach sands for 20 miles along the sea beach and a great deal of gold dust was mined from these sands. The number of miners on the Nome beach was about 1,500 and all of them produced sufficient gold to return to their homes in the States to live their natural way which in most cases was farming and no doubt a great many men acquired fortunes from that capital gained from Nome beach.

The rest of the Alaskan history you can find in your schoolbook and your teachers can give you authentic history of all the happenings to date. I am at present mining tungsten in this part of Nevada and especially in Sodaville, which is your native place to which you no doubt will return when you have reached the age that you have to earn your own living.

I hope that you will always remember your mother and father who have given you the chance to reach manhood, given also a chance to learn what others have accomplished tho you must also learn that "he who works gains what he works for and that very little comes to the ones who only wants and expect to get things without work." My best wishes to you as well as your brothers and sister and hope that you will always remember them, and that if any of them need your help that you give it without stint tho your mother and father come first.

I have been informed that you are studying Alaska & its natural resources among which is the gold discovery in which I took part in 1898 about September.

Gold had been discovered on the Seward Peninsula about 1872 but had not been considered in paying quantities, that is meant not in sufficient amount where a person alone or in company with other could earn an ordinary days wages or sufficient to warrant him or them to abandon further exploration of other areas where more remunerative alluvial deposits may exist. My two partners & myself had explored for about a month in a district where gold was found in the early spring of 1898 & named Council City a distance of 50 miles from Golovin Bay which was a trading settlement & missionary station at the entrance to Fish River. Council City became a small town with population of about 50 people & has remained up to date about the same.

On September the 4th 1898 my associates & myself decided to explore the country further to the westward & as we had 2 small boats we loaded them two boats with supplies food & mining equipment & traveled down river to Golovin Bay & there found a larger boat which we

MISS KATHY—Always volunteering when she can, Kathy Crayon got valuable help from the Wrenn brothers, Matthew and Jonah, in passing out programs for the school Christmas extravaganza.

Crayon shares colorful Christmas memories

By Sandra L. Medearis

Don't get Kathy Crayon started on Christmas stories. Kathy loves to tell stories, and Christmas stories are at the top of the list.

Here's one:

"It was my last Christmas in upper state New York, Troy, N. Y. I was in the Fifth grade. Back in those days I had a voice that was accepted in the choir at St. Pats. My sister and I were in the choir; my brother was an altar boy. So Midnight Mass was not an option.

"We went to church, did our duty, all the singing, all the Latin stuff.

"Lo, and behold! When we got home, we discovered Santa had been there!

"At the bottom of the stairs there were two gifts. There was a blue Huffy bike for me. Of course, I couldn't ride it until summer, but no problem! I was just totally in awe of Santa that he gave me a bike I couldn't ride in winter, but he was looking ahead.

"The other gift was a Linda Lou doll. A Linda Lou doll couldn't just come from anywhere, even from Santa's workshop. Someone had to send in box tops. It was all on the back of the cereal box. SOMEHOW, Santa must have eaten enough of that cereal to get that doll.

"It was a big doll, about 16 inches, with short black hair. It was one of the few toys I took to California with me six months later."

But Kathy Crayon has only begun:

"When my nephew Michael was three years old, the main thing he really wanted was a Wuzzles character by Disney. It was a Bumble Lion with stripes on the front and antennae on his head.

"But, my sister couldn't find that lion anywhere. All the stores were sold out. But friends of my sister went to Disneyland on Christmas Eve, and I got a phone call. They said there was one Bumble Lion, a demo model, did I want it?

"Of course," I said. That's what he wanted. If auntie could do it, they always got what they wanted. I wrapped him and set him under the tree. It was all worth it when he unwrapped it and said, 'Oh, Bumble Lion! I knew you would find me.'"

"Then there was the time when my youngest nephew..."

[Sorry, that's all you get—more Kathy Crayon stories next year!]

It's the thought that counts

Allison Wrenn tells about a surprising—but one of the best— presents she ever received.
When her son Matthew, now six years old, was three, she was tickled when he came home from pre-school with a present for her.
Allison, recently moved here from South Carolina with her husband Dr. Neil Wrenn, loves to cook healthy food from scratch.
“Anyone knows I do not cook instant foods or prepared food from boxes,” Allison explained.
So, she had to laugh when she pulled Matthew’s present from under the tree and opened it.
“It was a cookbook with recipes from the kids. Matthew’s recipe was for the frozen meal Kid Cuisine. [Yikes! 60-70 g of carbs, 600 plus calories]:

• Stick in microwave.
• Push “Cook.”
• Sit down at table and eat.
“I was delighted, even reading the other kids’ recipes. They were precious and brought tears to my eyes. I love homemade gifts.”

A time to renew old friendships:
The Seattle Nome Picnic 2009

By Laura Samuelson
The annual Nome Picnic held in Seattle’s Woodland Park has been a tradition for over 75 years. Every year the event brings together Nomeites who no longer live in Nome. There is no such thing as a former Nomeite, for once you have lived here you cannot ever get Nome out of your blood.
At this year’s picnic there was yet another eclectic mix of people with amazing ties to Nome. Meet Will Russell. His dad was Bruce Russell who was manager of United States Smelting Refining and Mining (USSR&M) from 1940-1957. Will set thaw points for USSRM, worked at Marks Air Force Base and was base engineer at Galena for Larry Galvin.
Richard B. McNees first came to Nome in 2009 on a Cruise West ship. After a visit to the Carrie McLain Museum, Richard decided to attend the Seattle picnic. His brother John A. McNees ran the Weather Bureau in Nome from 1942 -1964. John was also a Territorial Senator from Alaska. John bought Nome Beverages/ Nome Bottling Works and bottled Coca-Cola in Nome.
Two sisters drove from Oklahoma to look for family ties at the Nome

Picnic. They wanted to find out more about their uncle who they believe was a saloon owner in Nome from about 1902 to about 1920 or 1930. He changed his name when he moved to Nome, so that makes this search a little trickier. What they do know is that their great uncle was born Virgil Marion Allen 1854 in Arkansas. He left home at 14 and as a cowboy rode with Pancho Villa. The ladies thought that perhaps he was affiliated with the Southern Saloon. The staff at the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum did find

Bush Pilot

Folks in Nome will enjoy first-person stories of one of Alaska's pioneer bush pilots, who served Alaska from 1934 to 1941. Roy Dickson had heard of Nome from his flying-school friend, Hans Mirow of Mirow Air Service.

Dickson made frequent trips to Nome and became the first to fly air-mail to Shishmaref in November, 1938.

Roy found the July 4 celebration in Nome quite fascinating and recorded Eskimo games and high-lights in moving pictures, which are now available on DVD.

Saying it Sincerely

By Pastor Mike Christian, River of Life Assembly of God
For the Nome Ministerial Association
"The Gift of God"

"For unto us a child is born, to us a son is given, and the government will be on his shoulders. And he will be called Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, and Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there will be no end. He will reign on David's throne and over his kingdom, establishing and upholding it with justice and righteousness from that time on and forever. The zeal of the Lord Almighty will accomplish this." Isaiah 9:6-7

As I read these words I can't help but think about the beauty of Christmas. As exciting as the multi-colored lights, the beautiful trees with all the tinsel and bright colorful bulbs, and the wonderfully wrapped gifts are, I stand back in awe at the most beautiful gift that has ever been given to any of us throughout the years. I'm talking about the "Gift of God," Jesus Christ, his son. This "Gift" did not come wrapped in brightly colored paper with a shiny bow; instead it came to us in the form of a newborn baby. A baby that was born in a manger. On that first Christmas, there were no lights strung across the streets. There were no trees decorated with colorful bulbs, tinsel and lights. It was a night just like any other night, with one exception: the Son of God, Jesus Christ was born. Oh what a night!

I look at this passage in the book of Isaiah and my heart leaps with joy as I begin to recognize how precious this gift from God truly is to me. Throughout the years, He has proven himself to be my wonderful counselor. I cannot count the times Jesus has spoken to me through the word of God and brought direction to my life. His concern for me and my difficulties has always been shown by his loving words and instruction. As far as being "Mighty God" is concerned; he has not only shown me his awesome power, but has provided that power for me to live in on a daily basis. It is truly "in him that I live and move and have my being." Christ has proven to me that He is always there for me, regardless of the circumstance or situation I may be facing. Never has he let me down. And finally, he has always, and continues to bring his wonderful peace to my life. Without the peace of God being present in my heart and soul, my life would be in shambles. My existence would be meaningless. But because Christ lives, I can truly say, "I can face tomorrow." He is the glorious lord of glory, my friends.

My prayer for each of us this Christmas is that we will all recognize Jesus Christ as the most precious "gift" we have ever received. And that we will also allow Christ to rule in our hearts and minds so that we can experience all that he has for us.

He is truly the "gift that keeps on giving!" May you and yours have a wonderful, blessed Christmas and a glorious and Happy New Year!

Jump into January to start a year of good financial habits

By Loren Prosser

Now's the time many of us make resolutions for the New Year. With holiday bills arriving in the mail and tax season just around the corner, it's smart to make sure those resolutions include taking a fresh look at your financial picture and setting new financial goals and habits for 2010.

Do resolutions help? According to a study reported in the Journal of Clinical Psychology, people who make explicit resolutions are 10 times more likely to reach their goals than people who don't. The 2002 study* found 40 percent to 45 percent of American adults make one or more resolutions a year – and nearly half maintain them six months or longer.

We jump into January with great intentions. Yet for some, the goal of financial fitness fades into February then drops off the calendar entirely. The reason? They don't know where to begin. These ideas can help you stay on track:

Talk to your banker – One great way to get a jumpstart on a new financial plan is to meet with a personal banker or financial advisor. Just like staying on a New Year's diet, a little support and guidance from a "coach" can help you put together a great plan and turn it into an effective strategy you can stick with.

Set goals. When it comes to achieving financial success, you need to know where you are headed. Write down your financial goals – down payment on a home, college education for the kids, paying off high credit card balances. Add short-term goals such as saving for vacation because early success can encourage you to keep going long-term. Some financial institutions offer online tools that allow you to establish savings goals and monitor your progress toward reaching them. Be specific about the amount you will need and the target date for reaching each goal, then set up a savings plan that will get you there.

Take stock. Add up all your expenses for at least a month. Again, some financial institutions have online tools to help monitor transactions and track spending. With many online services, you can download transaction records directly to personal finance software, making it even easier to monitor your costs – no more sifting through shoeboxes stuffed with receipts at tax time. What's more, online services could help you reduce taxes by keeping track of every deductible expense.

Make two lists of expenses – essentials such as mortgage, taxes, food and insurance, and non-essentials (or at least more flexible costs) such as entertainment and clothing. You may be surprised at how much you're spending on the non-essentials. After you've taken stock of your expenses, it's important to continue to keep track of your finances. Sign up for online banking and online bill payment services, which allow you to set up automatic payments for recurring expenses.

Cut costs. How can you save when you spend every dime to meet expenses? You don't need to live like a miser to trim dollars from your monthly expenses – yet you do need to pay attention to every purchase and avoid impulse buying. Look again at those costs – you might find considerable savings.

For instance, does your financial services company have a relationship approach to service? In other words, does the company offer you more value and discounts – in time and money – the more business you do with them? Be sure to ask how you may qualify for relationship benefits that can reduce or even eliminate fees.

Also, talk with your insurer about how you can lower your insurance costs – and shop around for discounts. For example, many insurers offer a discount if they insure your home and your vehicles.

Cut credit card debt. According to the Federal Reserve, consumer credit debt in the United States totaled about $990 billion at the end of 2008. The average amount of credit card debt per household is estimated at about $8,500.

If you have large credit card balances, consider a home equity loan

United States General Services Administration

Notification is hereby given to the public of the U.S. General Services Administration's (GSA) intent to renew a lease in a building at 214 Front Street in Nome, Alaska.

Due to the location of Front Street and the city of Nome's location on the Bering Sea, a majority of the land in the vicinity is located in the FEMA 100 year floodplain. Therefore, the location of the building at 214 Front Street makes it susceptible to flooding at or above the 100-year flood level.

Under the President's Executive Order 11988, "Floodplain Management," GSA is required to review possible alternatives solutions to the proposed action. Alternatives that will be considered include taking no action.

Public comment is invited on possible alternatives. Interested persons may obtain more information about this action from GSA, Michael Levine, Regional Environmental Program Manager at 253-931-7263. Requests can be sent via e-mail to michael.levine@gsa.gov or by mail to U.S. GSA (10PMP), 400 15th St. SW, Auburn, WA 98103 Attn: Michael D. Levine. Comments about this action should be submitted in writing to the above name within 10 days of this notice.

to pay them off. The interest likely will be lower than that of credit cards, and your tax adviser can tell you if the interest qualifies as a tax deduction. If a home equity loan is not an option, you still can pay down the balances. Pay the minimum on the lowest-interest cards and as much as you can on the higher-interest cards until they're paid off.

Start saving. Start now, even if it's just a few dollars a week. You can have money automatically transferred from your checking account to savings each month to help build a nest egg. Ask your financial adviser about 401(k) and other direct-deposit accounts that move money straight to savings or investment funds. This process makes savings much easier, and a 401(k) can cut your tax bill. If your employer matches your 401(k) savings, try to have the maximum deducted each pay period.

Be flexible. Treat yourself to small splurges once in a while and don't get discouraged if an unexpected expense throws you off your budget one month. Just get back on the financial fitness track.

The most important step you take on any journey is the first one, so jump right in to January and head down the road to financial fitness. Come next December, you'll be glad you did.

Nanook runner to continue stride in Idaho

By Tyler Rhodes

Nanook senior AnnieKate Olson is trading one Coach Collins for another.

With high school coach Jeff Collins at her side, Nome's captain and lead runner from the 2009 girls' cross country squad signed a letter of intent Dec. 16 to run for coach Mike Collins at Lewis-Clark State College in Lewiston, Idaho.

Olson, who was this year's Region I North champion, said it wasn't until her senior season that she considered running at the college level. She credits Nome's Coach Collins with pushing her toward continuing her running career. "Jeff gave me the idea to run in college," she said.

And Jeff Collins has a good idea of what Olson will be in for in Lewiston. Jeff Collins is no stranger to Mike Collins' running program at Lewis-Clark, since the Nome coach ran for the Idaho school during his collegiate years. The two Coach Collins are not related.

Olson said the running program and course offerings at Lewis-Clark appealed to her. Her initial academic plans are to focus her studies on either the humanities or social work. The college has roughly 4,000 students.

For the brief ceremony Dec. 16, Olson was joined at the trophy-laden table in the Nome-Beltz High School library by her parents, Sharon Keeney and David Olson, as well as Jeff Collins and assistant coach Erika Eaton. While the ceremony put the final punctuation mark on Olson's high school career, Jeff Collins said the program at Lewis-Clark should serve as the start of a whole new level of running for his top ward from the 2009 season. "I think she will be a great addition to the Warrior's program. Any program in which she is not leading the pack will help AnnieKate develop as a runner," he said. "She is competitive, has a strong desire to excel and will learn what it takes to get back to the head of the pack again."

Jeff Collins said that when challenged to bring her performance up a notch in a quest for that regional title this year, Olson was able to shift gears and drive the pace of many races. "At the beginning of the season, after Kotzebue, I asked her how she felt about training to win regionals, to which she responded, 'Yeah, sure!'" Collins said. "I'm not sure if she believed in her ability enough then, but I and others saw the ability. When she realized what she was capable of, her times decreased, her focus increased and her goals started to become reality."

Nanook boys blast out of the gate

If the opening two games of the season are any indicator of things to come for the Nanook basketball team, Nome's boys may find themselves again on a path to the state tourney.

Kicking off the season at the Nome Recreation Center Saturday and Monday nights, the Nanooks showed no mercy in two decisive wins over Monroe Catholic High School.

In Saturday's action, Nome and

Monroe were even paced out of the gate, coming into the second quarter nearly tied. Aided by three three-pointers by Tim Sullivan in the second, Nome ended the first half with a 14-point lead. The Nanooks poured it on in the third, outscoring the guests from Fairbanks by 24.

Sullivan led Nome in the 87-47 win with the game-high 24 points.

Christian Leckband added 19 off the bench. Nome's Jeremy Head scored all 17 of his points in the first three quarters. Monroe was led by Jon Sniegowski's 14.

In Monday's action, Monroe started a late-game rally to try and close the gap against Nome, but it was too little too late. Sullivan again led Nome in the 64-51 win, scoring 25 points, including five three-pointers. Head chipped in 16 and Mason Evans went 6-6 from the charity line. Nick Gavora put up a respectable 21 points to lead the Rams.

Both the Nome boys and girls teams will next head to Anchorage over New Year's to participate in the Anchorage Christian School tournament. The boys will face Kotzebue in the first round Dec. 31.
